Caly'don. A forest celebrated in the romances relating to King Arthur and Merlin.

Camaral'zaman, Prince. Arabian Nights. One of the stories of the Arabian Nights and the name of a prince who fell in love with Badou'ra, Princess of China, the moment he saw her.

Ca-ma'cho. Don Quixote, Cervantes. A character in an episode in "Don Quixote," who gets cheated out of his bride after having made great preparations for their wedding.

Cam'ba-lo, or Cam'bel. Faery Queen, Spenser. A brother of Candace. He challenged every suitor to his sister's hand, and overthrew all except Tri'amond, who married the lady.

Cam'ba-lu. In the "Voyages" of Marco Polo the chief city of the province of Cathay.

Cam'buscan. A Tartar king identical with Genghis Khan. The King of the far East sent Cambuscan, a "steed of brass, which, between sunrise and sunset, would carry its rider to any spot on the earth." All that was required was to whisper the name of the place in the horse's ear, mount upon his back, and turn a pin set in his ear. When the rider had arrived at the place required, he had to turn another pin, and the horse instantly descended, and, with another screw of the pin, vanished till it was again required. This story is begun by Chaucer in the "Squire's Tale," but was never finished.

Cam'e-lot. A parish in Somersetshire, England (now called Queen's Camel), where King Arthur is said to have held his court. In this place there are still to be seen vast intrenchments of an ancient town or station — called by the inhabitants "King Arthur's Palace."

Ca'mille'. A member of the Parisian demimonde and the heroine of a play dramatized from the novel of "La Dame aux Camélias," by Alexander Dumas, the younger.

Can'a-ce. Faery Queen, Spenser. A paragon among women, the daughter of King Cambuscan to whom the King of the East sent as a present a mirror and a ring. The mirror would tell the lady if any man on whom she set her heart would prove true or false, and the ring (which was to be worn on her thumb) would enable her to understand the language of birds and to converse with them. Can'ace was courted by a crowd of suitors, but her brother gave out that anyone who pretended to her hand must encounter him in single combat and overthrow him. She ultimately married Tri'amond, son of the fairy Ag'apë.

Can-dide'. The hero of Voltaire's novel so called. All sorts of misfortunes are heaped upon him, and he bears them all with philosophical indifference.

Can'i'dia. A sorceress, alluded to by Horace, who could bring the moon from heaven.

Candor, Mrs. A most energetic slanderer in Sheridan's "School for Scandal."

Ca'ora. Description of Guiana, Raleigh. A river, on the banks of which are a people whose heads grow beneath their shoulders. Their eyes are in their shoulders, and their mouths in the middle of their breasts. The original picture is found in Hakluyt's "Voyages" 1598.

Cap'u-let. The head of a noble Veronese house in Shakespeare's tragedy of "Romeo and Juliet," — hostile to the house of Montague. He is at times self-willed and tyrannical, but a jovial and testy old man.

Cap'u-let, Lady. The proud and stately wife of Capulet, and mother of Juliet.

Carad'oc. A Knight of the Round Table. Also in history, the British chief whom the Romans called Carac-tacus. Caradoc is the hero of an old ballad entitled "The Boy and the Mantle."

Carker. A scoundrelly clerk in Dickens's "Dombey and Son."

Car'ton, Sidney. A hero transformed by unselfish love in Dickens's "Tale of Two Cities." He voluntarily goes to the guillotine to save his successful rival in love.

Car-ras'co, Sanson. A waggish bachelor of Salamanca, in Cervantes' romance, "Don Quixote."

Cas'ca. Julius Cæsar, Shakespeare. A blunt-witted Roman, one of the conspirators against Julius Cæsar.

Cas-san'dra. A daughter of Priam, King of Troy, gifted with the power of prophecy; but Apollo, whom she had offended, brought it to pass, that no one believed her predictions. Shakespeare makes use of this character in "Troilus and Cressida."

Ca-sel'la. The name of a musician and old friend of Dante, immortalized by him in his poem "La Divina Commedia."

Cassib'elan. Great-uncle to Cymbeline, in Shakespeare's play by that name.

Cas'si-o. A Florentine and lieutenant of Othello, and a tool of Iago, in Shakespeare's tragedy of "Othello." Iago made Cassio drunk, and then set on Roderigo to quarrel with him. Cassio wounded Roderigo. Othello suspended Cassio, but Iago induced Desdemo'na to plead for his restoration. This interest in Cassio, confirmed the jealous rage of Othello to murder Desdemo'na and kill himself. After the death of Othello, Cassio was appointed governor of Cyprus.

Castle Dangerous. A keep belonging to the Douglas family, which gives its name to one of Sir Walter Scott's "Tales of my Landlord." It was so called by the English because it was always retaken from them by the Douglas.

Castle of Indolence. The title of a poem by Thomson, and the name of a castle described in it as situated in a pleasing land of drowsiness, where every sense was steeped in the most luxurious and enervating delights.

Cas'tlewood, Beatrix. The heroine of Thackeray's novel "Henry Esmond," a picture of splendid, lustrous, physical beauty.

Caudle, Mrs. Margaret. The feigned author of a series of curtain lectures delivered to her husband, Job Caudle, who was a patient sufferer under this form of persistent nagging by his wife. The real author of these humorous lectures was Douglas Jerrold.

Cauline, Sir. The hero of an ancient English ballad preserved in Percy's "Reliques."

Cave of Mammon. The abode of the god of riches, described in the second book of Spenser's "Faëry Queen."

Cax'ton, Pi-sis'tra-tus. The hero of Bulwer Lytton's novel "The Caxtons," and of its sequel "My Novel."

Ce-cil'ia, St. A patron saint of the blind, also patroness of musicians, and "inventor of the organ." According to tradition, an angel fell in love with her for her musical skill, and used nightly to visit her. A crown of martyrdom was bestowed both upon her and her husband. Dryden and Pope have written odes in her honor, and both speak of her charming an angel by her musical powers.

Ced'ric. A Saxon thane in Scott's "Ivanhoe."

Ce'lia. Faëry Queen, Spenser. (1) Mother of Faith, Hope, and Charity. She was herself known as Heavenliness and lived in the hospices Holiness. (2) Celia, cousin to Rosalind in Shakespeare's Comedy "As You Like It." Celia is a common poetical name for a lady or a lady-love.

Ceph'alus and Procris. Cephalus was the husband of Procris, who, out of jealousy, deserted him. Cephalus went in search of her, and rested awhile under a tree. Procris discovered him, and crept through some bushes to ascertain if a rival was with him. Cephalus heard the noise and, thinking it to be made by some wild beast, hurled his javelin into the bushes and slew Procris. When the unhappy man discovered what he had done, he slew himself in anguish of spirit with the same javelin. This story is alluded to in "Pyramus and Thisbe," in Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," where they are humorously miscalled "Shafalus and Procus."

Chad'band, The Rev. A clerical character in Dickens' "Bleak House." He will always stand as a type of hypocritical piety.

Chan'ticleer. The cock, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox," and in Chaucer's "Nonne Prestes Tale."

Char'lemagne. The romance of Charlemagne and his Paladins is of French origin, as the romances of King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table is of Celtic or Welsh origin. According to one tradition Charlemagne is not dead, but waits crowned and armed, in Odenberg, near Saltzburg, till the time of antichrist, when he will wake up and deliver Christendom. According to another tradition, Charlemagne appears in seasons of plenty. He crosses the Rhine on a golden bridge, and blesses both corn-fields and vineyards.

Char'mi-an. A kind-hearted but simple-minded female attendant on Cleopatra in Shakespeare's play of "Antony and Cleopatra."

Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. The plan of the "Canterbury Tales" affords artistic scope for introducing a company of pilgrims on their way to the shrine of Thomas à Becket. It represents all classes of society and presents a series of tales of great interest set in the midst of beautiful descriptions of nature. The stories best worth reading are: "The Clerk's Tale" (Griseldis); "The Knight's Tale" (Palamon and Arcite); "The Man of Law's Tale" (Constance); "The Prioress's Tale" (Hugh of Lincoln); "The Priest's Tale" (Chanticleer and Pertelote).

Chery and Fair-Star. Countess d'Auluoy's Fairy Tales. Two children of royal birth, whom their father's brothers and their mother's sisters cast out to sea; they are found and brought up by a Corsair and his wife. Ultimately they are told of their birth by a green bird and marry each other. A similar tale is found in "The Arabian Nights."

Cheer'y-ble Brothers, The. A firm of benevolent London merchants in Dickens' "Nicholas Nickleby."

Chev'y Chase. The subject and the title of an famous old English ballad. The event which is commemorated is probably the battle of Otterburn, which happened in August, 1388, but it is impossible to reconcile the incidents of the poem with history.

Chib'iabas. The musician in Longfellow's "Hiawatha," personifying harmony in nature.

Childe Harold. Childe, so often used in old English ballads, is a title of honor as "Childe Harold," "Childe of Ellechilde Waters," "Childe Roland," "Childe Tristram," "Childe Arthur," etc. In Byron's poem "Childe Harold," the "Childe" is the poet himself represented as a man, sated of the world roaming from place to place. In canto I., he visits Portugal and Spain; in canto II., Turkey in Europe; in canto III., Belgium and Switzerland; and in canto IV., Venice, Rome, and Florence.

Children in the Wood. Two characters in an ancient and well-known ballad entitled "The Children in the Wood, or The Norfolk Gent's Last Will and Testament." This is said to be a disguised recital of the alleged murder of his nephews by Richard III. This is the story as related in Percy's "Reliques." The master of Wayland Hall, Norfolk, on his deathbed left a little son, three years old, and a still younger daughter, named Jane, to the care of his wife's brother. If the children died before they came to their majority, their uncle was to inherit their estate. After twelve months had elapsed, the uncle hired two ruffians to murder the two babes. As they went along one of the ruffians relented, and killed his fellow; then, putting down the children in a wood, left them. The poor babes gathered blackberries to allay their hunger, but died during the night, and "Robin Redbreast" covered them over with strawberry leaves. Addison says of the ballad referred to, that it is "one of the darling songs of the common people."

Chil'ingly, Kenelm. The hero in a novel by this name by Bulwer.

Chin-gach'gook. A sagamore of the Mohicans, and father of Uncas, in Cooper's "Leather-Stocking Tales."

Chlo'e, Daphins and Chloe Longue. (1) The shepherdess loved by Daphne. (2) "Paul and Virginia" by St. Pierre is founded on this romance. (3) Chloe is also a shepherdess in Shakespeare's "As You Like It."

Chœ'reas. The lover of Callir'rhoë, in Cha'riton's Greek romance.

Chriemhild or Chriemhilde. The heroine of the German epic poem, the "Nibelungen Lied." She is represented as a woman of the rarest grace and beauty, and rich beyond conception. By the treacherous murder of her husband she is transformed into a furious creature of revenge. For plot of this epic cycle, see Kreimhild.

Chris'ta-bel. (1) The subject and heroine of an old romance by Sir Eglamour of Artois. (2) The heroine of an ancient ballad "Sir Cauline." (3) The lady in Coleridge's poem "Christabel."

Chris'tian. The hero of John Bunyan's allegory "Pilgrim's Progress." He flees from the "City of Destruction," and journeys to the "Celestial City." He starts with a heavy burden on his back, but it falls off when he stands at the foot of the cross. All his trials on the way are depicted.

Christian'a. The wife of Christian, who started with her children and Mercy from the "City of Destruction" forms the subject of Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," part II. She was placed under the guidance of Mr. Great-Heart, and met her husband at the Celestial City.

Christopher, St. The giant that carried a child over a brook, and said, "Chylde, thou hast put me in grete peryll. I might bere no greater burden." The Chylde was the Christ and the burden was the "Sin of the world." This has been a favorite theme for painters.

Chris'tus, a Mystery. A dramatic trilogy by Henry W. Longfellow: Part I, "Divine Tragedy." Part II, "The Golden Legend"; Part III, "New England Tragedies."

Chrysalde. A character in Molière's "L'École des Femmes"; a friend of Arnolphe.

Chrysale. An honest, simple-minded, hen-pecked tradesman, in the same comedy by Molière.

Chuz'zle-wit, Martin. The hero of Dickens' novel of the same name.

Chuz'zle-wit, Jonas. A miser and a murderer, the opposite type of character from Martin.

Cid Campeador is the name given in histories, traditions, and songs to the epic hero of Spain. So greatly was he honored that he was called "Mio Cid el Campeador," my lord the champion. Relics of the "Blessed Cid," as he is still called in Spain, such as his sword, shield, banner, and drinking-cup, are still held in great reverence by the populace. The numerous "Cid Romances" that were first published in the Sixteenth Century, contain the most romantic improbabilities concerning the life and deeds of the "Cid." The most interesting chronicle of the "Cid" for English readers was written by Robert Southey.

Cim-me'ri-ans. A people described by Homer dwelling "beyond the ocean-stream," in a land where the sun never shines.

Cinderella. Heroine of a fairy tale. She is the drudge of the house, while her elder sisters go to fine balls. At length a fairy enables her to go to the prince's ball; the prince falls in love with her, and she is discovered by means of a glass slipper which she drops, and which will fit no foot but her own. She is represented as returning good for evil and heaping upon her half-sisters every kindness a princess can show.

Ci-pan'go. A marvelous island, described in the "Voyages" of Marco Polo, the Venetian traveler. It is represented as lying in the eastern seas, some 1,500 miles from land, and of its beauty and wealth many stories are related. Columbus and early navigators made a diligent search for this island.

Clare, Ada. The wife of Carstone, and one of the most important characters in Dickens' "Bleak House."

Clem'en-ti'na, The Lady. A beautiful and accomplished woman, deeply in love with Sir Charles Grandison, in Richardson's novel of this name.

Clifford, Paul. An attractive highwayman and an interesting hero in Bulwer's novel by the same name. He is familiar with the haunts of low vice and dissipation, but afterward is reformed and elevated by the power of love.

Clinker, Humphrey. The hero of Smollett's novel entitled, "The Expedition of Humphrey Clinker," a philosophic youth who meets many adventures. Brought up in the work-house, put out by the parish as apprentice to a blacksmith, he was afterward employed as a hostler's assistant. Having been dismissed from the stable, and reduced to great want, he at length attracts the notice of Mr. Bramble, who takes him into his family as a servant. He becomes the accepted lover of Winifred Jenkins, and at length turns out to be a natural son of Mr. Bramble.

Clo'ten. A rejected lover of Imogen, in Shakespere's play of "Cymbeline."

Clorin'da, Jerusalem Delivered, Tasso. Clorinda, the heroine of this poem, is represented as an Amazon inspiring the most tender affection in others, especially in the Christian chief Tancred; yet she is herself susceptible of no passion but the love of military fame.

Clout, Colin. A name that Spenser applies to himself in the "Faëry Queen" and "Shepherd's Calendar." Colin Clout also is introduced into Gay's pastorals.

Cœ'lebs. The hero of a novel by Hannah More, "Cœlebs in Search of a Wife."

Col-lean', May. The heroine of a Scottish ballad.

Cologne, The Three Kings of. A name given to the three magi who visited the infant Saviour, and whose bodies are said to have been brought by the Empress Helena from the East to Constantinople, whence they were transferred to Milan. Afterward, they were removed to Cologne and placed in the principal church of the city, where, says Cressy, "they are to this day celebrated with great veneration." Their names are commonly said to be Jaspas, Melchior, and Balthazar.

Comedy of Errors. Shakespere. Twin brothers of exact likeness named Antipholus are served by attendant slaves named Dromio also of striking resemblance. The humor of the play lies in the complications that arise. The two brothers are lost at sea with their servants and are picked up by different vessels. After long separation they all reappear in Ephesus. There is great entanglement of plot until both brothers face each other in a trial before the duke and all is explained.

Co'mus. In Milton's poem entitled "Comus: a Masque," he is represented as a base enchanter, who endeavors, but in vain, to beguile and entrap the innocent by means of his enchantments.

Consuelo. The heroine of George Sand's novel of the same name, an impersonation of noble purity sustained amidst great temptations.

Co-phet'u-a. An imaginary African king, of whom a legendary ballad told that he fell in love with a beggar maid and married her. This ballad is found in Percy's "Reliques." Many poets have made use of the story. Tennyson has given us a modern version in "The Beggar Maid."

Cop'per-field, David. The hero of Dickens' novel of the same name. This is said to be Dickens' favorite among his works and somewhat autobiographic.

Corde'lia. King Lear, Shakespere. The youngest of Lear's three daughters, and the one that truly loved him.

Cor'y-don. A shepherd in one of the "Idyls of Theocritus," and one of the Eclogues of Virgil. Used by Shakespere and later poets to designate a rustic swain.

Cos'tard. A clown, in Shakespere's "Love's Labors Lost," who apes the display of wit and misapplies, in the most ridiculous manner, the phrases and modes of combination in argument that were then in vogue.

Cov'er-ley, Sir Roger. One of the members of the imaginary club under whose direction the "Spectator" was professedly edited. He was a kind-hearted, simple-minded, type of an English Squire in the time of Queen Anne. He figures in thirty papers of the "Spectator."

Crabtree. A character in Smollett's novel, "The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle."

Crane, Ichabod. The name of a Yankee schoolmaster, whose adventures are related in the "Legend of Sleepy Hollow," in Irving's "Sketch-book."

Craw'ley, Rawdon. The husband of Becky Sharp in "Vanity Fair," Thackeray's novel without a hero.

Crea'kle, Mr. A tyrannical and cruel schoolmaster in Dickens' "David Copperfield."

Cres'si-da. The heroine of Shakespere's play, "Troilus and Cressida," also the heroine of one of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales."

Croaker. A character in Goldsmith's comedy, "The Good-natured Man."

Crum'mles, Vincent. A theatrical head of a theatrical family in Dickens' "Nicholas Nickleby."

Cru'soe, Rob'in-son. The hero of De Foe's great novel; a ship-wrecked sailor who for many years leads a solitary existence on an uninhabited island of the tropics, where he employed the most admirable ingenuity in providing for his daily wants.

Cuneiform Letters. Wedge-shaped letters which occur in old Persian and Babylonian inscriptions. This is probably the oldest form of writing.

Cym'beline. A mythical king of Britain and the hero of Shakespere's play of the same name. Imogen, daughter of Cymbeline, king of Britain, married clandestinely Posthumus Leonatus; and Posthumus, being banished for the offense, retired to Rome. One day, in the house of Philario, the conversation turned on the merits of wives, and Posthumus bet his diamond ring that nothing could tempt the fidelity of Imogen. Through the villainy of Iachimo Cymbeline was forced to believe Imogen untrue. The villainy was in time disclosed and the beautiful character of Imogen revealed.

Cut'tle, Captain. A character in Dickens' "Dombey and Son," good-humored, eccentric, pathetic in his simple credulity.

Day'onet, Sir. In the romance "Le Mort d'Arthur" he is called the fool of King Arthur.

Dal-get'ty, Rittmaster Dugald. A soldier of fortune in Sir Walter Scott's "Legend of Montrose," distinguished for his pedantry, conceit, valor, vulgar assurance, knowledge of the world, greediness, and a hundred other qualities, making him one of the most amusing, admirable, and natural characters ever drawn by the hand of genius.

Dam'o-cles, a flatterer in the court of Dionysius of Syracuse. By way of answer to his constant praises of the happiness of kings, Dionysius seated him at a royal banquet, with a sword hung over his head by a single horsehair. In the midst of his magnificent banquet, Damocles, chancing to look upward, saw a sharp and naked sword suspended over his head. A sight so alarming instantly changed his views of the felicity of kings. The phrase signifies now evil foreboding or dread, a tantalizing torment.

Da'mon and Py'thias, or Phi'ntias, two noble Pythagoreans of Syracuse, who have been remembered as models of faithful friendship. Pythias having been condemned to death by Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse, begged to be allowed to go home, for the purpose of arranging his affairs, Damon pledging his own life for the reappearance of his friend. Dionysius consented, and Pythias returned just in time to save Damon from death. Struck by so noble an example of mutual affection, the tyrant pardoned Pythias, and desired to be admitted into their sacred fellowship.

Dandie Dinmont. A jovial, true-hearted store-farmer, in Sir Walter Scott's "Guy Mannering."

Dantes'que. Dante-like—that is, a minute lifelike representation of the infernal horrors, whether by words, as in the poet, or in visible form, as in Doré's illustrations of the "Inferno."

Daph'nis and Chlo'e. A pair of lovers in the pastoral romance of the same name written by Longus in Greek prose in the Fourth Century.

Darby and Joan. A married couple said to have lived, more than a century ago, in the village of Healaugh, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and celebrated for their long life and conjugal felicity. They are the hero and heroine of a ballad called "The Happy Old Couple," which has been attributed to Prior, but is of uncertain authorship. Timperley says that Darby was a printer in Bartholomew Close, who died in 1730, and that the ballad was written by one of his apprentices by the name of Henry Woodfall.

Da'res. One of the competitors at the funeral games of Anchises in Sicily, described in the fifth book of "Virgil's Æneid."

David. He was the uncle of King Arthur. St. David first embraced the ascetic life in the Isle of Wight, but subsequently removed to Menevia, in Pembrokeshire, where he founded twelve convents.

David, in Dryden's satire called "Absalom and Achitophel," represents Charles II.; Absalom, his beautiful but rebellious son, represents the Duke of Monmouth.

Davy, Henry IV., Shakespere. The varlet of justice Shallow, who so identifies himself with his master that he considers himself half host half varlet. Thus when he seats Bardolph and Page at table, he tells them they must take "his" good will for their assurance of welcome.

Dawfyd The Betrothed, Scott. "The one-eyed" freebooter chief.

Dawkins. Oliver Twist, Dickens. Known by the sobriquet of the "Artful Dodger." He is one of Fagin's tools. Jack Dawkins is a scamp, but of a cheery, buoyant temper.

Deans, Douce Davie. A poor herdsman at Edinburgh, and the father of Effie and Jeanie Deans, in Sir Walter Scott's novel, "The Heart of Mid-Lothian."

Deans, Effie. A beautiful but unfortunate character in Sir Walter Scott's "Heart of Mid-Lothian."

Deans, Jeanie. The heroine of "The Heart of Mid-Lothian," characterized by her kindness, sturdiness, and good sense. She journeys from Edinburgh to London, and obtains pardon for her sister Effie, condemned for child murder.

De'bon. One of the heroes who accompanied Brute to Britain. According to British fable, Devonshire is the county or share of Debon.

Decameron. A volume of one hundred tales told by Boccaccio. Ten ladies and their gentlemen assembled in one place agree that each shall tell one story every day for the entertainment of the rest. Thus ten stories daily are told for ten consecutive days. Chaucer borrowed the plan but reconstructed it for his "Canterbury Tales."

Dedlock, Sir Leicester. A character in Bleak House, by Charles Dickens. An honorable and truthful man but of such fixed ideas that no man could shake his prejudices. He had an idea that the one thing of greatest importance to the world was a certain family by the name of Dedlock. He loved his wife, Lady Dedlock and believed in her implicitly. His pride had a terrible fall when he learned the secret of her life before her marriage and knew the terrible fact she had been hiding from him that she had a daughter.

Dedlock, Lady. Wife of Sir Leicester, beautiful, and apparently cold and heartless but suffering constant remorse. The daughter's name is Esther Summerson, the heroine of the novel.

Dedlock, Volumnia. Cousin of Sir Leicester, a young lady of sixty, who had the disagreeable habit of entering into other people's business.

Deerslayer. The hero of a novel by the same name, by James Fenimore Cooper. A strong fine character, honorable, truthful, brave, without cultivation but without reproach. This character appears under different names in five of Cooper's novels. "The Deerslayer," "The Pathfinder," "The Last of the Mo'icans," "The Pioneers," and "The Prairie."

Defarge, Mons. Tale of Two Cities, Dickens. Keeper of a wine shop in the Faubourge St. Antoine, in Paris. He is a bull-necked, implacable-looking man.

Delphin Classics. For the use of the dauphin, son of Louis XIV. (1674-91), the writings of thirty-nine Latin authors were collected and published in sixty volumes. Notes and an index were added to each work. An edition of the Delphin classics was published in London in the year 1818.

Delphine. The title of a novel by Mme. de Staël and the name of its heroine.

Delphine, Madame. Old Creole Days, George W. Cable. A free quadroon connected with the splendor of La Fitts, the smuggler and patriot. Madame Delphine disowned her beautiful daughter Olive in order to assure to her the rights of a white woman.

Demetrius. Midsummer Night's Dream, Shakespeare. The young Athenian to whom Egeno promised his daughter Hermia in marriage.

De Profundis. "Out of the Depths." The 130th Psalm is so called from the first two words in the Latin version. In the Roman Catholic Liturgy it is sung when the dead are committed to the grave.

Deronda, Daniel. One of George Eliot's strongest character sketches in her novel by the same name.

Deserted Village. A poem by Goldsmith in which he describes rural England. He calls the village Auburn, but tells us it was the seat of his youth, every spot of which was dear and familiar to him. He pictures familiar persons, the preacher, the teacher, pastimes, and favorite haunts.

Desmas. The repentant thief is so called in "The Story of Joseph of Arimathea." Longfellow, in "The Golden Legend," calls him Dumachus. The impenitent thief is called Gestas, but Longfellow calls him Titus.

Dhu, Roderick. A highland chieftain and outlaw in Scott's poem "Lady of the Lake," cousin of Ellen Douglas, and also her suitor. He is slain by James-Fitz-James.

Di'do. The daughter of Belus, King of Tyre, and the wife of Sichæus, whom her brother Pygmalion murdered for his riches. Not far from the Phenician colony of Utica she built the city of Carthage. According to Virgil, when Æneas was shipwrecked upon her coast, in his voyage to Italy, she hospitably entertained him, fell in love with him, and, because he did not requite her passion, stabbed herself in despair.

Dies Iræ, the name generally given (from the opening words) to the famous mediæval hymn on the Last Judgment. On account of the solemn grandeur of the ideas which it brings before the mind, as well as the deep and trembling emotions it is fitted to excite, it soon found its way into the liturgy of the Church. The authorship of the hymn has been ascribed to Gregory the Great, St. Bernard of Clairvaux, Umberto, and Frangipani, the last two of whom were noted as church-hymnists.

Diggon, Davie. A shepherd in the "Shepherd's Calendar," by Spenser. He tells Hobbinol that he drove his sheep into foreign lands, hoping to find better pasture; but he was amazed at the luxury and profligacy of the shepherds whom he saw there, and the wretched condition of the flocks.

Dimmesdale, Arthur. In Hawthorne's romance "The Scarlet Letter," a Puritan minister of great eloquence and spirituality, in Colonial New England, who secretly commits adultery and afterwards makes a public confession.

Di'nah, Aunt. In Sterne's "Tristram Shandy." She leaves Mr. Walter Shandy £1,000, which he fancies will enable him to carry out all the schemes that enter into his head.

Dinah, Friendly. The Bashful Man, Moncrieff. Daughter of Sir Thomas Friendly.

Dinah. St. Ronan's Well, Scott. Daughter of Sandie Lawson, landlord of the Spa hotel.

Dinah. A character in Mrs. Stowe's "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

Ding'ley Hall. Pickwick Papers, Dickens. The home of Mr. Wardle and his family, and the scene of Tupman's love adventure with Miss Rachel.

Diome'des or Diomed. Iliad, Homer. King of Æto'lia, in Greece, brave and obedient to authority. He survived the siege of Troy; but on his return home found his wife untrue to him. He fled to Italy and remained in exile.

Dirlos, Count. One of Charlemagne's paladins, an ideal of valor, generosity, and truth.

Divine Comedy. Dante's immortal work, the "Divina Commedia," was written during the period 1300-18, and has been translated into English by Cary, Longfellow, and others. Dante called it a comedy only because the ending was not tragical, and the epithet divine was given to it in admiration. The name "Commedia" signifies lowly, written in the common tongue, or as some explain, "comedy" also signifies ending happily. The "Divine Comedy" is an epic poem, divided into three parts; Inferno, Purgatorio, Paradiso. The poet depicts a vision, in which he is conducted, first by Virgil (human reason) through hell and purgatory; and then by Beatrice (revelation), and finally by St. Bernard through the several heavens, where he beholds the triune God. In all parts of the regions thus traversed, there arise conversations with noted personages. The deepest questions of philosophy and theology are discussed and solved; and the social and moral condition of Italy, with the corruptions of Church and State, are depicted with indignation. Fifty-two years after the poet's death, the Republic of Florence, set apart an annual sum for public lectures to explain the "Divine Comedy" to the people in one of the churches, and Boccaccio himself was appointed first lecturer.

Doctour of Phisikes, Tale. Is the Roman story of Virginius, given by Livy. Told by Chaucer in "Canterbury Tales."

Doctor Syntax. The hero of a work entitled "The Tour of Dr. Syntax in Search of the Picturesque," Doctor Syntax is a simple-minded, pious, henpecked clergyman, but of excellent taste and scholarship who left home in search of the picturesque. His adventures are told in eight-syllable verse by William Combe. "Dr. Syntax's Horse." Grizzle, all skin and bone.

Dods. The old landlady in Scott's novel called "St. Ronan's Well." An excellent character, a mosaic of oddities, all fitting together, and forming an admirable whole. She was so good a housewife that a cookery book of great repute bears her name.

Dodson. The Three Warnings, Mrs. Thrale. A youth called upon by Death on his wedding day. Death told him he must go with him. "With you!" the hapless youth cried, "young as I am." Death then told him he would not disturb him yet, but would call again after giving him three warnings. When he was 80 years of age, Death called again. "So soon returned?" old Dodson cried. "You know you promised me three warnings." Death then told him that as he was "lame, and deaf, and blind," he had received his three warnings.

Dodson and Fogg. The lawyers employed by the plaintiff in the famous case of "Bardell v. Pickwick," in the "Pickwick Papers," by Charles Dickens.

Do'eg. Absalom and Achitophel, Dryden. Doeg was Saul's herdsman, who had charge of his mules and asses. He told Saul that the priests of Nob had provided David with food; whereupon Saul sent him to put them to death, and eighty-five were ruthlessly massacred.

Dogberry and Verges, two ignorant conceited constables, in Shakespeare's "Much Ado About Nothing."

Dolly Murry. A character in Crabbe's "Borough" who was devoted to playing cards. She died at the card table.

Dolly Varden. Barnaby Rudge, Dickens. Daughter of Gabriel Varden, locksmith. Dolly dressed in the Watteau style, and was lively, pretty, and bewitching.

Dolopa'tos. Sandabar's Parables. The Sicilian king, who placed his son Lucien under the charge of "seven wise masters." The son fell under the father's fury and was condemned to death. By astrology the prince discovered that if he could tide over seven days his life would be saved; so the wise masters amused the king with seven tales, and the king relented. The prince himself then told a tale which embodied his own history; the eyes of the king were opened, and the queen was condemned to death.

Dom'bey. Dombey and Son, Dickens. Mr. Dombey, a self-sufficient, purse-proud, frigid merchant, who feels satisfied there is but one Dombey in the world, and that is himself. When Paul was born, his ambition was attained, his whole heart was in the boy, and the loss of the mother was but a small matter. The boy's death turned his heart to stone.

Dombey, Florence. A motherless child, hungering and thirsting to be loved, but regarded with indifference by her father, who thinks that sons alone are worthy of regard.

Dombey, Little Paul. A pathetic child in Dickens' novel "Dombey and Son." He is a delicate, thoughtful boy, the only son of a rich and pompous London merchant.

Dom-dan'i-el. A cave in the region adjoining Babylon, the abode of evil spirits. By some traditions said to have been originally the spot where the prophet Daniel imparted instruction to his disciples. In another form, the Domdaniel was a purely imaginary region, subterranean, or submarine, the dwelling-place of genii and enchanters.

Do'mesday Book, or Doo'msday Book, the name of one of the oldest and most valuable records of England, containing the results of a statistical survey of that country made by William the Conqueror, and completed in the year 1086. The origin of the name—which seems to have been given to other records of the same kind—is somewhat uncertain; but it has obvious reference to the supreme authority of the book in doom or judgment on the matters contained in it.

Dominical Letter, or Sunday Letter, is one of the seven letters A, B, C, D, E, F, G, used in almanacs, etc., to mark the Sundays throughout the year. The first seven days of the year being marked in their order by the above letters in their order, then the following seven, and all consecutive sets of seven days to the end of the year are similarly marked; so that the 1st, 8th, 15th, 22d, etc., days of the year are all marked by A; and the 2d, 9th, 16th, 23d, etc., by B; and so on. The days being thus marked, it is evident that on whatever day the first Sunday of the year falls, the letter which marks it will mark all the other Sundays in the year, as the number of the letters and of the days in the week is the same. As the common year consists of fifty-two weeks and one day over, the dominical letters go backwards one day every common year. If the dominical letter of a common year be G, F will be the dominical letter for the next year.

Dom'inie, Sampson. Guy Mannering, Scott. A village schoolmaster and scholar, poor as a church mouse, and modest as a girl. He cites Latin like a "porcus litera'rum," and exclaims "Prodigious!" He has fallen to the leeward in the voyage of life. He is no uncommon personage in a country where a certain portion of learning is easily attained by those who are willing to suffer hunger and thirst in exchange for acquiring Greek and Latin.

Don Ad'ri-a'no de Ar-ma'do. A pompous, fantastical Spaniard in Shakespeare's "Love's Labor's Lost," "who has a mint of phrases in his brain." His language is fantastically out of proportion to the thought. He uses "examples suited only to the gravest propositions and impersonations, or apostrophes to abstract thoughts impersonated, which are, in fact, the natural language only of the most vehement agitations of the mind."

Don-a-tel'lo. The hero of Hawthorne's romance "The Marble Faun." He is a young Italian with a singular likeness to the Faun of Praxiteles. He leads an innocent but purely animal existence, until a sudden crime awakens his conscience and transforms his whole nature.

Don Cher'u-bim. The "Bachelor of Salamanca," in Le Sage's novel of this name; a man placed in different situations of life, and made to associate with all classes of society, in order to give the author the greatest possible scope for satire.

Don'e-gild. Man of Law's Tale, Chaucer. Mother of Alla, King of Northumberland, hating Constance, the wife of Alla, because she was a Christian, she put her on a raft with her infant son, and turned her adrift. When Alla returned from Scotland and discovered this cruelty of his mother, he put her to death. The tradition of St. Mungo resembles the "Man of Law's Tale" in many respects.

Don'et, the first grammar put into the hands of scholars. It was that of Dona'tus the grammarian, who taught in Rome in the Fourth Century, and was the preceptor of St. Jerome.

Don Giovan'ni. Mozart's best opera.

Don Ju'an is a legendary and mythical personage like Dr. Faustus. Don Juan is presented in the life of a profligate who gives himself up so entirely to the gratification of sense, especially to the most powerful of all the impulses, that of love, that he acknowledges no higher consideration, and proceeds to murder the man that stands between him and his wish, fancying that in so doing he had annihilated his very existence. He then defies that Spirit to prove to his senses his existence. The Spirit returns and compels Don Juan to acknowledge the supremacy of spirit, and the worthlessness of a merely sensuous existence. The traditions concerning Don Juan have been dramatized by Tirso de Molina; thence passed into Italy and France. Glück has a musical ballet of Don Juan, and Mozart has immortalized the character in his opera of "Don Giovanni." His adventures form the subject of a half-finished poem by Byron.

Don Quix'ote. The hero of a celebrated Spanish romance of the same name by Cervantes. Don Quixote is represented as "a gaunt country gentleman of La Mancha, full of genuine Castilian honor and enthusiasm, gentle and dignified in his character, trusted by his friends, and loved by his dependents," but "so completely crazed by long reading the most famous books of chivalry, that he believes them to be true, and feels himself called on to become the impossible knight-errant they describe, and actually goes forth into the world to defend the oppressed and avenge the injured, like the heroes of his romances." The fame of Cervantes will always rest upon this incomparable satire upon the foolish and extravagant romances of chivalry.

Doorm. Idylls of the King; Enid, Tennyson. An earl called "the Bull," who tried to make Enid his handmaid; but, when she would neither eat, drink, nor array herself in bravery at his bidding, "he smote her on the cheek"; whereupon Geraint slew the "russet-bearded earl" in his own hall.

Do'ra. David Copperfield, Dickens. The child-wife to David, affectionate and tender-hearted. She was always playing with her poodle and saying simple things to her "Dody." She could never be his helper but she looked on her husband with idolatrous love. When quite young she died.

Do-ras'tus. The hero of an old popular "history" or romance, upon which Shakespeare founded his "Winter's Tale." It was written by Robert Greene, and was first published in 1588, under the title of "Pandosto, the Triumph of Time."

Dorothea. The heroine of Goethe's celebrated poem of "Hermann und Dorothea."

Dorrit, Edward, and "Little." Little Dorrit, Dickens. The father of the Marshalsea prison and his interesting daughter. It is a fine picture of innocent, affectionate, child-life in the midst of the trying circumstances of a debtor's prison.

Dory, John. A character in "Wild Oats" or "The Strolling Gentleman," a comedy by John O'Keefe.

Do-the-Boys' Hall. Nicholas Nickleby, Dickens. A school for boys kept by a Mr. Squeers a puffing, ignorant, over-bearing brute, whose system of education consisted of alternately beating and starving.

Doubting Castle. The castle of the giant Despair, in which Christian and Hopeful were incarcerated, but from which they escaped by means of the key called "Promise," which was able to open any lock in the castle.

Dous'ter-swiv'el. A German schemer, in Sir Walter Scott's novel of "The Antiquary."

Drac. A sort of fairy in human form, whose abode is the caverns of rivers. "Faire le drac," same as "Faire le diable." Irish, "Play the Puck"; English, "Play the deuce."

Dragon, A. The device on the royal banner of the old British kings. The leader was called the pendragon. Geoffrey of Monmouth says, "When Aurelius was king, there appeared a star at Winchester of wonderful magnitude and brightness, darting forth a ray, at the end of which was a flame in form of a dragon."

Drama of Exile, A. A poem by Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1844). The exile is Eve, driven out of paradise into the wilderness, Lucifer, Gabriel, and Christ are introduced into the poem, as well as Adam and Eve.

Dramatic Unities, The Three. One catastrophe, one locality, one day. These are Aristotle's unities of time, place, and action. To these the French have added a fourth, the unity of uniformity, i. e., in tragedy all the "dramatis personæ" should be tragic in style, in comedy comic, and in farce farcical.

Drap. Drayton. One of Queen Mab's maids of honor.

Draw'can-sir. The name of a blustering, bullying fellow in the celebrated mock-heroic play of "The Rehearsal," written by George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, assisted by Sprat and others. He is represented as taking part in a battle, where, after killing all the combatants on both sides, he makes an extravagantly boastful speech. From the popularity of the character, the name became a synonym for a braggart.

Driver. Guy Mannering, Scott. Clerk to Mr. Pleydell, advocate, Edinburgh.

Dro'mio. The Brothers Dromio. The brothers exactly alike, who serve two brothers exactly alike, in Shakespere's "Comedy of Errors," based on the "Menæch'mi of Plautus."

Dry-as Dust, The Rev. An imaginary personage who serves to introduce Scott's novels to the public.

Dudu, one of the three beauties of the harem, into which Juan, by the sultana's order, had been admitted in female attire.

Du-es'sa. A foul witch, in Spenser's "Faëry Queen," who under the assumed name of Fidessa, and the assumed character of a distressed and lovely woman, entices the Redcross Knight into the House of Pride. The knight having left the palace, is overtaken by Duessa, and drinks of an enchanted fountain, which paralyses him, in which state he is attacked, defeated, and imprisoned by the giant Orgoglio. Duessa becomes the paramour of Orgoglio, who decks her out in gorgeous ornaments, gives her a gold and purple robe to wear, puts a triple crown on her head, and sets her upon a monstrous beast with seven heads. Prince Arthur slays Orgoglio and rescues the knight. Duessa is stripped of her gorgeous disguise and is found to be a hideous hag.

Duff, Jamie. Guy Mannering, Scott. The idiot boy attending Mrs. Bertram's funeral.

Dulcine'a-del Toboso. A country girl whom Don Quixote courts as his lady love.

Du-maine'. A lord attending on the King of Navarre, in Shakespere's "Love's Labor's Lost."

Dun'can. (1) A king of Scotland immortalized in Shakespere's tragedy of "Macbeth." Shakespere represents him as murdered by Macbeth, who succeeds to the Scottish throne, but according to history he fell in battle. (2) A highland hero in Scott's "Lady of the Lake."

Dunder, Sir David, of Dunder Hall. A conceited, whimsical old gentleman, who forever interrupts a speaker with "Yes, yes, I know it," or "Be quiet, I know it." "Ways and Means," by Colman.

Dun-drear'y, Lord. A grotesque character in Taylor's comedy, "Our American Cousin"; noted for his aristocratic haughtiness of manner. The character is said to have been created by the actor Sothorn.

Du'ran'dal', written also Durandart, Durindana, and Durlindana. The name of the marvelous sword of Orlando, the renowned hero of romance. It is said to have been the workmanship of the fairies, who endured it with such wonderful properties that its owner was able to cleave the Pyrenees with it at a blow.

Du-ran-dar'te. A fabulous hero of Spain, celebrated in the ancient ballads of that country and in the romances of chivalry. Cervantes has introduced him, in "Don Quixote," in the celebrated adventure of the knight in the cave of Montesinos.

Dur'den, Dame. (1) The heroine of a popular English song. She is described as a notable housewife, and the mistress of five serving-girls and five laboring men. The five men loved the five maids. (2) A sobriquet playfully applied to Esther Summerson, the heroine of Dickens's "Bleak House."

Dur'ward, Quen'tin. The hero of Scott's novel of the same name; a young archer of the Scottish guard in the service of Louis XI. of France. When Liège is assaulted, Quentin Durward and the Countess Isabelle, who has been put into his charge, escape on horseback. The countess publicly refuses to marry the Duc d'Orléans, to whom she has been promised, and ultimately marries the young Scotchman.

Dwarf, The Black. A novel by Sir Walter Scott. The black dwarf is a fairy of the most malignant character; a genuine northern Duergar, and once held by the dalesmen of the border as the author of all the mischief that befell their flocks and herds. In Scott's novel the "Black Dwarf" is introduced under the "aliases" of Sir Edward Mauley; Elshander, the recluse; Canie Elshie; and the Wise Wight of Mucklestone Moor.

Dwarf, Alberich. In the "Nibelungen Lied" the dwarf "Alberich" is the guardian of the famous "hoard" won by Siegfried from the Nibelungs. The dwarf is twice vanquished by the hero, who gets possession of his "Tarn-kappë" (cloak of invisibility).

Dwarf, Peter. An allegorical romance by Ludwig Tieck. The dwarf is a castle specter that advises and aids the family; but all his advice turns out evil, and all his aid productive of trouble.

Earnscliffe, Patrick. Black Dwarf, Scott. The young laird of Earnscliff.

Eb'lis. The name given by the Arabians to the prince of the apostate angels, whom they represent as exiled to the infernal regions for refusing to worship Adam at the command of the Supreme. Eblis alleged, in justification of his refusal, that he himself had been formed of ethereal fire, while Adam was only a creature of clay.

Eck'hardt, The Faithful. A legendary hero of Germany, represented as an old man with a white staff, who, in Eisleben, appears on the evening of Maundy Thursday, and drives all the people into their houses, to save them from being harmed by a terrible procession of dead men, headless bodies, and two-legged horses, which immediately after passes by. Other traditions represent him as the companion of the knight, Tannhäuser, and as warning travelers from the Venusberg, the mountain of fatal delights in the old mythology of Germany. Tieck has founded a story upon this legend, which has been translated into English by Carlyle, in which Eckhardt is described as the good servant who perishes to save his master's children from the seducing fiends of the mountain. The German proverb, "Thou art the faithful Eckhardt; thou warnest everyone," is founded upon this tradition.

Eclecta, the "Elect" personified in "The Purple Island," by Phineas Fletcher. She is the daughter of Intellect and Voletta (free-will).

Ector, Sir. The foster-father of King Arthur, and lord of many parts of England and Wales. Father of Sir Kay, seneschal to King Arthur.

Edda. There are two religious codes, so called, containing the ancient Scandinavian mythology. One is in verse, composed in Iceland in the Eleventh Century, by Sæmund Sigfusson, "the Sage"; and the other in prose, compiled a century later by Snorro Sturleson, who wrote a commentary on the first edda.

E'den-hall, The Luck of. A painted goblet in the possession of the Musgrave family of Eden-hall, Cumberland, said to have been left by the fairies on St. Cuthbert's Well. The tradition runs, that the luck of the family is dependent on the safe keeping of this goblet. The German poet Uhland embodied the legend in a ballad, translated into English by Longfellow.

Edgar. Son to Gloucester, in Shakespere's tragedy of "Lear." He was disinherited for his half-brother, Edmund.

Edgar or Edgar'do. Master of Ravenswood, in love with Lucy Ashton in Scott's "Bride of Lammermoor."

E'dith. The "Maid of Lorn" in Scott's "Lord of the Isles," who married Ronald when peace was restored after the battle of Bannockburn.

Edith, The Lady. Ivanhoe, Scott. Mother of Athelstane "the Unready" (thane of Coningsburgh).

Edith Granger. Daughter of the Hon. Mrs. Skewton, married to Colonel Granger of "Ours," who died within two years. Edith became Mr. Dombey's second wife, but the marriage was altogether unhappy.

Edith Plantagenet, The Lady. The Talisman, Scott. Called "The Fair Maid of Anjou," a kinswoman of Richard I., and attendant on Queen Berengaria.

Edmund. A bastard son of Gloucester in Shakespeare's tragedy of "King Lear."

Edward, Sir. The Iron Chest, Coleman. He commits a murder, and keeps a narrative of the transaction in an iron chest. Later, he trusts the secret to his secretary, Wilfred, and the whole transaction now became public.

Edward. Count Robert of Paris, Scott. Brother of Hereward, the Varangian guard. He was slain in battle.

Edwin. (1) The hero of Goldsmith's ballad entitled "The Hermit." (2) The hero of Mallet's ballad "Edwin and Emma." (3) The hero of Beattie's "Minstrel."

Edyrn. Idylls of the King (Enid), Tennyson. Son of Nudd. A suitor for the hand of Enid and an evil genius of her father, who opposed him. Later, Eyrn went to the court of King Arthur and became quite a changed man—from a malicious "sparrowhawk" he was converted into a courteous gentleman.

Egeus. Father of Hermia in Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream."

Egil. Brother of Weland, a great archer. The story related is similar to the William Tell story. There are many such stories. One day, King Nidung commanded him to shoot at an apple placed on the head of his own son. Egil selected two arrows, and being asked why he wanted two, replied, "One to shoot thee with, O tyrant, if I fail." Such stories, though probably not true to fact, are true to the spirit of patriotism, and are worth repeating.

Eg'lan-tine, Madame. The prioress in Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales," who was "full pleasant and amiable of port." She was distinguished for the ladylike delicacy of her manners at table, and for her partiality to "small hounds," and a peculiar mixture in her manner and dress of feminine vanity and slight worldliness, together with an ignorance of the world. She is noted for her partiality to lap-dogs, her delicate oath, "by Seint Eloy," her "entuning the service sweetly in her nose," and her speaking French "after the scole of Stratford atte Bowe."

Eg'la-mour. (1) A character in Shakespeare's "Two Gentlemen of Verona," who is an agent of Silvia in her escape. (2) (Sir.) A valiant knight of the Round Table, celebrated in the romances of chivalry, and in an old ballad. [Written also "Eglamore."]

Egyptian Thief. A personage alluded to by the Duke in Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night." The reference is to the story of Thyamis, a robber-chief and native of Memphis.

Eivir. Harold the Dauntless, Scott. A Danish maid, who assumes boy's clothing, and waits on Harold "the Dauntless," as his page.

E-laine'. A mythic lady in the romances of King Arthur's court. She is called "the lily maid of Astolat" in Tennyson's "Idylls of the King." For love of Sir Launcelot she died, and then at her request was borne on a barge to the castle of King Arthur, holding a lily in one hand and a letter to Launcelot in the other. According to Sir Thomas Malory, Elaine was sister of King Arthur by the same mother. She married Sir Nentres of Carlot, and was by King Arthur the mother of Mordred.

El'ber-ich. In German hero legends, a dwarf who aided the Lombard Emperor Otnit to win the daughter of the Soldan of Syria. He is identical with the Oberon of French and English fairy mythology.

Elbow. A constable, in Shakespeare's "Measure for Measure," modest and well-meaning, though of simple mind and the object of wit among those who are wiser but not better.

El Do-ra'do. A name given by the Spaniards to an imaginary country, supposed, in the Sixteenth Century, to be situated in the interior of South America, between the rivers Orinoco and Amazon, and abounding in gold and all manner of precious stones. Expeditions were fitted out for the purpose of discovering this fabulous region; and, though all such attempts proved abortive, the rumors of its existence continued to be believed down to the beginning of the Eighteenth Century.

E-lec'tra. The daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, and the heroine of a tragedy by Sophocles and of another by Euripides. She saved the life of her brother, Orestes, and afterwards assisted him to avenge their father's death. (See Agamemnon, Clytemnestra, and Orestes.)

Elf-land. The realm ruled over by Oberon, King of Faëry.

El'githa. Ivanhoe, Scott. A female attendant at Rotherwood on the Lady Rowe'na.

El'i-dure. A legendary King of Britain, fabled to have been advanced to the throne in place of his brother, Artegall, or Arthgallo. Returning to the country after a long exile, Artegall accidentally encountered his brother, who received him with open arms, took him home to the palace, and reinstated him in his old position, abdicating the throne himself. Wordsworth has taken the story of these two brothers for the subject of a poem.

E'lim. The Messiah, Klopstock. The guardian angel of Libbeus the Apostle. Libbeus, the tenderest and most gentle of the apostles, at the death of Jesus also died from grief.

Elliott, Hobbie. There are seven by this name in the "Black Dwarf," by Sir Walter Scott. The farmer Elliott himself and his bride-elect, Grace Armstrong; Mrs. Elliott, Hobbie's grandmother; John and Harry, Hobbie's brothers; Lillas, Jean, and Arnot, Hobbie's sisters.

El'ope. Milton gives this name to the dumb serpent which gives no warning of its approach.

El'speth. (1) A character in Sir Walter Scott's "Antiquary." (2) An old servant to Dandie Dinmont, in Scott's "Guy Mannering."

Elsie. The daughter of Gottlieb, a farm tenant of Prince Henry of Hoheneck, who offered her life as a substitute for the prince. She was rescued as she was about to make the sacrifice. Longfellow has told this story in "The Golden Legend."

Elzevier, or Elzevir. The name of a celebrated family of printers at Amsterdam, Leyden, and other places in Holland, whose beautiful editions were chiefly published between the years 1583 and 1680. These editions are unrivaled both for beauty and correctness. It is said that the Elzeviers generally employed women to correct the press, under the conviction that they would be less likely than men, on their own responsibility, to introduce alterations into the text. They printed in all about two thousand books, of which nine hundred sixty-eight were in Latin, forty-four in Greek, one hundred twenty-six in French, thirty-two in Flemish, eleven in German, ten in Italian, and twenty-two in Oriental languages. Rare editions of the Elzeviers are highly valued by collectors.

Em'elye. The sister-in-law of "Duke Theseus," beloved by the two knights, Pal'amon and Ar'cyte.

E-mile'. The hero of Jean Jacques Rousseau's novel of the same name, in which he has depicted his ideal of a perfectly educated young man.

E-mil'i-a. (1) A lady attending Hermione in Shakespeare's "Winter's Tale." (2) Wife to Iago, and waiting woman to Desdemona, in the tragedy of "Othello," a woman of thorough vulgarity and loose principles, united to a high degree of spirit, energetic feeling, strong sense, and low cunning. (3) The sweetheart of Peregrine Pickle in Smollett's novel "The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle."

Em'ly, Little. David Copperfield, Dickens. Daughter of Tom, the brother-in-law of Dan'el Peggotty, a Yarmouth fisherman, by whom the orphan child was brought up. David Copperfield and Em'ly were at one time playfellows. While engaged to Ham Peggotty (Dan'el's nephew), Little Em'ly runs away with Steerforth, a friend of David's, who was a handsome but unprincipled gentleman. Being subsequently reclaimed, she emigrates to Australia with Dan'el Peggotty and old Mrs. Gummidge.

Empyre'an. According to Ptolemy, there are five heavens, the last of which is pure elemental fire and the seat of Deity: this fifth heaven is called the empyrean (from the Greek "en-pur," in fire).

Endell, Martha. David Copperfield, Dickens. A poor girl, to whom Em'ly goes when Steerforth deserts her.

En-dym'i-on. A beautiful shepherd boy whom Diana kissed while he lay asleep on Mount Latmus. The story was made the subject of an English poem by Keats, in memory of his much-loved friend, the poet Shelley.

E'nid. A mythical lady mentioned in a Welsh triad as one of the three celebrated ladies of Arthur's court—a beautiful picture of conjugal patience and affection. Her story is told in the "Mabinogion," and in Tennyson's "Idylls of the King." In the midst of an impure court she is the personification of purity.

Enigma. The origin of the enigma is doubtful. Gale thinks that the Jews borrowed their enigmatical forms of speech from the Egyptians. The philosophy of the Druids was altogether enigmatical. In Nero's time the Romans were often obliged to have recourse to this method of concealing truth under obscure language.

Eolian Harp. Baruch. There is a Rabbinical story of the aerial harmony of the harp of David, which, when hung up at night, was played upon by the north wind.

Epigram. A short pointed or antithetical poem: or any short composition happily or antithetically expressed.

Epitaphs. Boileau. They were used by the ancient Jews, by the Athenians, the Romans, and most of the nations of antiquity: their date is referred in England to the earliest times. In the epitaphs of the ancients arose the epigram.

Epithalamium was a species of poem which it was the custom among the Greeks and Romans to sing in chorus near the bridal-chamber of a newly married couple. Anacreon, Stesichorus, and Pindar composed poems of this kind, but only scanty fragments have been preserved. Spenser's "Epithalamium," written on the occasion of his marriage, is one of the finest specimens of this kind of verse.

Eppie. St. Ronan's Well, Scott. One of the servants of the Rev. Josiah Cargill. In the same novel is Eppie Anderson, one of the servants at the Mowbray Arms, Old St. Ronan's, held by Meg Dods.

Eppie. In George Eliot's "Silas Marner" the child of Godfrey Cass, brought up and adopted by Silas Marner, whose love transformed him from a miser into a tender, loving father.

Ep'i-men'i-des. A philosopher and poet of Crete, who probably lived in the Sixth or Seventh Century, B. C. He is said to have fallen asleep in a cave, when a boy, and to have remained in that state for fifty-seven years. On waking and going out into the broad daylight, he was greatly perplexed and astonished to find everything around him altered. But what was more wonderful still, during his long period of slumber, his soul, released from its fleshly prison, had been busily engaged in the study of medicine and natural philosophy: and when it again became incarnated, Epimenides found himself a man of great knowledge and wisdom. Goethe has written a poem on the subject, "Des Epimenides Erwachen." (See Klaus, Peter, and Winkle, Rip Van.)

Erl-king. King of the elves, who prepares mischief for children, and even deceives men with his seductions. He is said to haunt the Black Forest. Goethe has a ballad called "The Erl King."

Ermangarde of Baldingham, Lady. Thé Betrothed, Scott. Aunt of the Lady Eveline Berenger, "the betrothed."

Er'meline. The wife of Reynard, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox."

Ermina. The heroine of Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," who fell in love with Tancred. When the Christian army besieged Jerusalem, she dressed herself in Clorinda's armor to go to Tancred, but, being discovered, fled, and lived awhile with some shepherds on the banks of the Jordan. Meeting with Vafri'no, sent as a secret spy by the crusaders, she revealed to him the design against the life of Godfrey, and, returning with him to the Christian camp, found Tancred wounded. She cured his wounds, so that he was able to take part in the last great day of the siege.

Ernest, Duke. A poetical romance by Henry of Veldig (Waldeck), contemporary with Frederick Barbarossa. It is a mixture of Greek and Oriental myths and hero adventures of the Crusader.

Error. Faery Queen, Spenser. A monster who lived in a den in "Wandering Wood," and with whom the Red Cross Knight had his first adventure. She had a brood of 1,000 young ones of sundry shapes, and these cubs crept into their mother's mouth when alarmed, as young kangaroos creep into their mother's pouch. The knight was nearly killed by the stench which issued from the foul fiend, but he succeeded in "rafting" her head off, whereupon the brood lapped up the blood, and burst with satiety.

Es'ca-lus. An ancient and kindhearted lord, in Shakespeare's "Measure for Measure," whom Vincentio, the Duke of Vienna, joins with Angelo as his deputy during a pretended absence on a distant journey.

Es'ca-nes. A lord of Tyre, in Shakespeare's "Pericles."

Esmeralda. Notre Dame de Paris, Victor Hugo. A beautiful gipsy-girl, who, with tambourine and goat, dances in the "place" before Notre Dame.

Esmond, Henry. A cavalier and fine-spirited gentleman in reign of Queen Anne. Hero of Thackeray's novel by same name.

Es-tel'la. The heroine of Dickens's novel of "Great Expectations."

Es-tot'i-land or Es-tot'i-land'i-a. An imaginary region in America, near the Arctic Circle, referred to by Milton as "cold Estotiland," and variously fabled to have been discovered by Frisian fisherman in the Fourteenth Century, and by a Pole named John Scalve, in 1477.

Etzel, i. e., Attila. King of the Huns a monarch ruling over three kingdoms and more than thirty principalities: being a widower, he married Kriemhild, the widow of Siegfried. In the Nibelungen-Lied, where he is introduced, he is made very insignificant.

Eu'phrasy. Paradise Lost, Milton. The herb eye-bright: so called because it was once supposed to be efficacious in clearing the organs of sight. Hence, the archangel Michael purged the eyes of Adam with it, to enable him to see into the distant future.

Eu'phu-es. The principal character in Lyly's two famous works, entitled "Euphues, or the Anatomy of Wit," and "Euphues and His England." These works are remarkable for their pedantic and fantastical style, and for the monstrous and overstrained conceits with which they abound. Euphues is represented as an Athenian gentleman, distinguished for the elegance of his person and the beauty of his wit, and for his amorous temperament and roving disposition. He gained a bosom friend, Philautus, and then robbed him of his lover, Lucilla. The lady is false to both, the friends are reconciled, and Euphues returns to Athens and philosophy. The peculiarities of Lyly's style are a perpetual striving after alliteration and antithesis, and a most ingenious stringing together of similes. This book immediately became the rage in the court circles, and for many years was the court standard. From this book we get our words; euphuistia, euphuism, meaning an affected, bombastic style of language.

Eu'lalie, St. In the calendar of saints there is a virgin martyr called Eulalie. She was martyred by torture February 12, 308. Longfellow calls Evangeline the "Sunshine of St. Eulalie."

Eulen-spie'gel. The hero of a German tale, which relates the pranks and drolleries of a wandering cottager of Brunswick.

Evan Dhu M'Combich. Waverley, Scott. The foster-brother of M'Ivor.

Evan Dhu of Lochiel. Legend of Montrose, Scott. A Highland chief in the army of Montrose.

Evan'geline. The heroine of Longfellow's poem. The subject of the tale is the expulsion of the inhabitants of Aca'dia (Nova Scotia) from their homes by order of George II., and the life-long wanderings of Evangeline in search of her lover, Gabriel. It is a story of a woman's love and devotion.

Evan'gelist, in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," represents the effectual preacher of the Gospel, who opens the gate of life to Christian.

Every Man in His Humor. A comedy by Ben Jonson. Every person in the play is liable to be duped by his special humor; Captain Bobadil's humor is bragging; Kitem's is jealousy; Stephen's is stupidity; Knowell's is suspicion; Dame Kitem's, like her husband's, is jealousy.

Evir-Allen. Fingal, Ossian. The white-armed daughter of Branno, an Irishman. "A thousand heroes sought the maid: she refused her love to a thousand. The sons of the sword were despised, for graceful in her eyes was Ossian."

Evelina. The heroine in a novel by the same name, by Miss Burney.

Excal'ibur. Meaning of the words: "liberated from the stone." The name of Arthur's far-famed sword, which he unfixed from a miraculous stone, though previously two hundred and one of the most puissant barons in the realm had singly been unable to extract it. In consequence of this remarkable feat, Arthur was chosen and proclaimed king by general acclamation. When about to die, he sent an attendant to throw the weapon into a lake hard by. Twice eluding the request, the squire at last complied. A hand and arm arose from the water, and caught the sword by the hilt, flourished it thrice, and then sank into the lake, and was seen no more. [Written also "Excalibor," "Escalibar," "Es-calibor," and "Caliburn."]

Ez'zelin, Sir. Lara, Byron (1814). The gentleman who recognizes Lara at the table of Lord Otho, and charges him with being Conrad the Corsair. A duel ensues, and Ezzelin is never heard of more. A serf used to say that he saw a huntsman one evening cast a dead body into the river which divided the lands of Otho and Lara, and that there was a star of knighthood on the breast of the corpse.

Eyre, Jane. The heroine of Charlotte Brontë's novel of the same name, a governess in the family of a Mr. Rochester, to whom she is finally married.

Faa, Gabriel. Guy Mannering, Scott. Nephew of Meg Merrilies. One of the huntsmen at Liddesdale.

Fab'liaux. The metrical fables of the Trouvères, or early poets north of the Loire, in the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries. The word fable, in this case, is used very widely, for it includes not only such tales as "Reynard the Fox," but all sorts of familiar incidents of knavery and intrigue, all sorts of legends and family traditions. The fabliau of "Aucassin and Nicolette" is full of interesting incidents, and contains much true pathos and beautiful poetry.

Fadla Deen. The hypercritical Grand Chamberlain in Thomas Moore's poem "Lalla Rookh." Fadladeen's criticism upon the several tales which make up the romance are very racy and full of humor; and his crest-fallen conceit when he finds out that the poet was the prince in disguise is well conceived.

Faery or Feerie Land. The land of the fays or fairies. The chief fay realms are Av'alon, an island somewhere in the ocean. Oberon's dominions, situate "in wilderness among the holtis hairy"; and a realm somewhere in the middle of the earth, where was Pari Banou's palace.

Faery Queen. A metrical romance, in six books, of twelve cantos each, by Edmund Spenser. The hero, Prince Arthur, arriving at the court of Glouana, the Faëry Queen, in Fairyland, finds her holding a solemn festival during twelve days. At the court there is a beautiful lady, for whose hand twelve most distinguished knights are rivals, and in order to settle their pretensions these twelve heroes undertake twelve separate adventures. The first book contains the legend of the Red Cross Knight, who is the allegorical representative of "Holiness," while his mistress Una represents true "Religion"; and the action of the knight's exploit shadows forth the triumph of Holiness over the enchantments and deceptions of Heresy. The second book is the legend of Sir Guyon. The third book is the legend of Britomartis—a female champion—or "Chastity." Britomartis is Diana, or Queen Elizabeth the Britoness. The fourth book is the legend of Cambel and Tri'amon (fidelity). The fifth book is the legend of Ar'tegal (justice). The sixth book is the legend of Sir Cal'idore (courtesy). The remaining books were never completed. The plan of the "Faëry Queen" is borrowed from the Orlando Furioso, but the creative power of Spenser is more original, and his imagery more striking, than Ariosto's.

Fag. A lying servant to Captain Absolute in Sheridan's "Rivals."

Fa'gin. An old Jew in Dickens's "Oliver Twist," who employs young persons of both sexes to carry on a systematic trade of robbery.

Fain'all, Mr. and Mrs. Noted characters in Congreve's Comedy "The Way of the World."

Faineant, Le Noir (the Black Idler). In Sir Walter Scott's "Ivanhoe," a name applied to Richard Cœur de Lion, in disguise, by the spectators of a tournament, on account of his indifference during a great part of the action, in which, however, he was finally victorious.

Falkland. In Godwin's novel called "Caleb Williams." He commits murder, and keeps a narrative of the transaction in an iron chest. Williams, a lad in his employ, opens the chest, and is caught in the act by Falkland. The lad runs away, but is hunted down. This tale, dramatized by Colman, is entitled "The Iron Chest."

Fairy. Fairy-lore of the nursery grows out of belief in Providence, the Good and the Bad. Good fairies are called fairies, elves, elle-folks, and fays; the evil ones are urchins, ouphes, ell-maids, and ell-women.

Fairy of the Mine. A malevolent being supposed to live in mines, busying itself with cutting ore, turning the windlass, etc., and yet effecting nothing.

Fair Maid of Perth. The title of a novel by Sir Walter Scott, and the name of the heroine.

Fairservice, Andrew. A shrewd Scotch gardener at Osbaldistone Hall in "Rob Roy," Sir Walter Scott.

Faithful. One of the allegorical personages in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," who dies a martyr before completing his journey.

Faithful, Jacob. The title and hero of a sea tale, by Captain Marryat (1835).

Fa'kenham Ghost. A ballad by Robert Bloomfield, author of "The Farmer's Boy." The ghost was a donkey.

Fakreddin's Valley. Over the several portals of bronze were these inscriptions: (1) "The Asylum of Pilgrims"; (2) "The Traveler's Refuge"; (3) "The Depository of the Secrets of All the World."

Fal'staff, Sir John. A famous character in Shakespeare's comedy of the "Merry Wives of Windsor," and in the first and second parts of his historical drama of "Henry IV." He is as perfect a comic portrait as was ever sketched. In the former play, he is represented as in love with Mrs. Ford and Mrs. Page, who make a butt and a dupe of him; in the latter, he figures as a soldier and a wit; in both he is exhibited as a monster of fat, sensual, mendacious, boastful, and cowardly. In Henry V. his death is described by Mrs. Quickly.

Fang. A sheriff's officer, in the second part of Shakespeare's "King Henry IV."

Fang, Charles Dickens's "Oliver Twist." A bullying insolent magistrate, who would have sent Oliver Twist to prison, on suspicion of theft, if Mr. Brownlow had not interposed.

Fa'ta Morgana. The name of a potent fairy, celebrated in the tales of chivalry, and in the romantic poems of Italy. She was a pupil of the enchanter Merlin, and the sister of Arthur, to whom she discovered the intrigue of his queen, Geneura, or Guinever, with Lancelot of the Lake. In the "Orlando Innamorato" of Bojardo, she appears at first as a personification of Fortune, inhabiting a splendid residence at the bottom of a lake, and dispensing all the treasures of the earth, but she is afterward found in her proper station subject to the all potent Demogorgon. Also, as sister to King Arthur and pupil of Merlin. She lived at the bottom of the lake and dispensed good fortune as she liked.

Fata Alci'na. Bojardo Orlando Innamorato (1495). Sister of Fata Morgana. She carried off Astolfo on the back of a whale to her isle, but turned him into a myrtle tree when she tired of him.

Fat Boy, The. A laughable character in Dickens's "Pickwick Papers"; a youth of astonishing obesity, whose employment consists in alternate eating and sleeping.

Fathom, Ferdinand, Count. The title of a novel by Smollett, and the name of its principal character, a complete villain, who proceeds step by step to rob his benefactors and finally dies in misery and despair.

Fat'i-ma. (1) A female worker, in the story of "Aladdin," in the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments." (2) The last of the wives of Blue-Beard, and the only one who escaped being murdered by him.

Faust. The hero and title of a celebrated tragedy by Goethe, the materials of which are drawn in part from the popular legends of Dr. Faustus, a famous magician of the Sixteenth Century. Faust is a student who is toiling after knowledge beyond his reach, and who afterwards deserts his studies, and makes a pact with the Devil (Mephistopheles), in pursuance of which he gives himself up to the full enjoyment of the senses, until the hour of his doom arrives, when Mephistopheles reappears upon the scene, and carries off his victim as a condemned soul. This mystical personage dates back to the time of the Reformation.

Faus'tus. The hero of Marlowe's tragedy of the same name; represented as a vulgar sorcerer tempted to sell his soul to the Devil (Mephistopheles), on condition of having a familiar spirit at his command, the possession of earthly power and glory, and unlimited gratification of his sensual appetites, for twenty-four years; at the end of which time, when the forfeit comes to be exacted, he shrinks and shudders in agony and remorse, imploring yet despairing of the mercy of heaven. This has been the theme of many writers. It is the subject of an opera by Gounod.

Faw, Tibbie. Redgauntlet, Scott. The ostler's wife, in Wandering Willie's tale.

Feast of Lemuria. The festival called "Lemuria" was held on the 9th, 11th, and 13th of May, and was accompanied with ceremonies of washing hands, throwing black beans over the head, etc., and the pronunciation nine times of these words: "Begone, you specters of the house!" which deprived the Lemuriæ of their power to harm. Ovid describes the Lemuriæ in the fifth book of his "Fasti."

Feast of Lights. Christmas was called the "Feast of Lights" in the Western or Latin Church, because at this feast they used more candles or lights, symbolic of Christ, The Light of all lights.

Felton, Septimius. Septimius Felton is the mystical hero in Hawthorne's novel by the same name.

Fe-nel'la. A fairy-like creature, a deaf and dumb attendant on the Countess of Derby, in Sir Walter Scott's "Peveril of the Peak."

Fen'ton. A character in Shakespeare's "Merry Wives of Windsor," who woos the rich Anne Page for her money, but soon discovers inward treasures in her which quite transform him.

Fer'Amorz. Lalla Rookh, Thomas Moore. Fer Amorz in Lalla Rookh is the young Cashmerian poet, who relates poetical tales to Lalla Rookh, in her journey from Delhi to Lesser Buchar'ia. Lalla Rookh is going to be married to the young sultan, but falls in love with the poet. On the wedding morn she is led to her future husband, and finds that the poet is the sultan himself, who had gallantly taken this course to win the heart of his bride and beguile her journey.

Ferdinand. (1) A character in Shakespere's "Tempest." He is a son of the King of Naples, and falls in love with Miranda, the daughter of Prospero, a banished Duke of Milan. (2) King of Navarre, a character in "Love's Labor's Lost."

Ferrers. Endymion. The hero of Benjamin Disraeli's novel "Endymion."

Ferrex and Porrex. Two sons of Gorboduc, a mythical British king. Porrex drove his brother from Britain, and when Ferrex returned with an army he was slain, but Porrex was shortly after put to death by his mother. One of the first, if not the very first, historical plays in the English language was "Ferrex and Porrex," by Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville.

Fib. Nymphidia. Drayton. One of the fairy attendants to Queen Mab.

Fidel'le. Cymbeline, Shakespere. The name assumed by Imogen, when, attired in boy's clothes, she started for Milford Haven to meet her husband Posthumus.

Fidele. Subject of an elegy by Collins.

Fidessa. Faery Queen, Spenser. The companion of Sansfoy; but when the Red Cross Knight slew that "faithless Saracen," Fidessa turned out to be Duessa, the daughter of Falsehood and Shame. The sequel must be sought under the word Duessa.

Fine-Ear. Fairy Tales (Fortunio), Comtesse D'Aunoy. One of the seven attendants of Fortunio. He could hear the grass grow, and even the wool on a sheep's back. This is an old, old story. It is also found in Grimm's Fairy Tales. There the hero is "Fortunio." In the German tale "Fortunio" the fairy gave her a horse named Comrade, not only of incredible swiftness, but all-knowing, and endowed with human speech; she also gave her an inexhaustible turkey-leather trunk, full of money, jewels, and fine clothes. By the advice of Comrade, she hired seven gifted servants, named Strongback, Lightfoot, Marksman, Fine-ear, Boisterer, Trinquet, and Grugeon. Fortunio goes forth disguised as a warrior, meets her king and marries him.

Finetta, The Cinder Girl. A fairy tale by the Comtesse D'Aunoy. This is merely the old tale of Cinderella slightly altered.

Fin'gal, or Fin-gal. A mythical hero, whose name occurs in Gaelic ballads and traditions, and in Macpherson's "Poems of Ossian."

Fires of St. John. A representative play of the school to which Sudermann belongs. The whole group of plays of which "The Fires of St. John" is a type register a movement of revolt against the conventionalities of life in Germany as Ibsen's dramas express the revolt against the conventionalities of life in Northern Europe.

Firmin, Philip. The hero of Thackeray's novel, "The Adventures of Philip."

Fle'ance. A son of Banquo, in Shakespere's tragedy of "Macbeth." The legend relates that after the assassination of his father he escaped to Wales, where he married the daughter of the reigning prince, and had a son named Walter. This Walter afterwards became lord high steward of Scotland, and called himself Walter the Steward. From him proceeded in a direct line the Stuarts of Scotland, a royal line which gave James VI. of Scotland, James I. of England. This myth has been seriously accepted by some as fact.

Fledge'by. Our Mutual Friend, Dickens. An overreaching cowardly sneak who pretends to do a decent business under the trade name of Pubsey & Co.

Flo-ren'ti-us. A knight whose story is related in the first book of Gower's "Confessio Amantis." He bound himself to marry a deformed hag, provided she taught him the solution of a riddle on which his life depended.

Flor'ian. The Foundling of the Forest, W. Dimond. Discovered in infancy by the Count de Valmont, and adopted as his own son. Flor'ian is light-hearted and volatile, but with deep affection, very brave, and the delight of all who knew him.

Flor'i-mel. A female character in Spenser's "Faery Queen," of great beauty, but so timid that she feared the "smallest monstrous mouse that creeps on floor," and was abused by everyone. She was noted for sweetness of temper amid great trials. The word Florimel signifies "honey-flower."

Flor'i-zel. A prince of Bohemia, in Shakespere's "Winter's Tale," in love with Perdita.

Flu-el'len. A Welsh captain, who is an amusing pedant, in Shakespere's "Henry V."

Flying Dutchman. A spectral ship, seen in stormy weather off the Cape of Good Hope, and considered ominous of ill-luck. Captain Marryat has taken this theme for his novel "The Phantom Ship."

Folk. Fairies, also called "people," "neighbors," "wights." The Germans have their Kleine volk (little folk), the Swiss their hill people and earth people. See Fairies.

Ford. Mr. and Mrs. Ford are characters in "The Merry Wives of Windsor." Mrs. Ford pretends to accept Sir John Falstaff's protestations of love, in order to punish him by her devices.

For'tin-bras. Prince of Norway, in Shakespere's tragedy "Hamlet."

Fortunatus. You have found Fortunatus's purse. Are in luck's way. The nursery tale of Fortunatus records that he had an inexhaustible purse. It is from the Italian fairy tales.

Fortunio's Horse. Comrade, not only possessed incredible speed, but knew all things, and was gifted with human speech. (See "Fine-ear.")

Forty Thieves. In the tale of Ali Baba (Arabian Nights' Entertainments). Represented as inhabiting a secret cave in a forest, the door of which would open and shut only at the sound of the magic word "Sesame," the name of a kind of grain. One day, Ali Baba, a wood-monger, accidentally discovered the secret, and made himself rich by carrying off gold from the stolen hoards. The captain tried several schemes to discover the thief, but was always outwitted by Morgia'na, the wood-cutter's female slave.

Foxley, Squire Matthew. Redgauntlet, Sir W. Scott. A magistrate who examines Darsie Latimer (Sir Arthur Darsie Redgauntlet), after he had been attacked by the rioters.

Francesco. The "Iago" of Massinger's "Duke of Milan."

Frank'en-stein. The hero in Mrs. Shelley's romance of the same name. As a young student of physiology he constructs a monster out of the horrid remnants of the churchyard and dissecting-room, and endues it, apparently through the agency of galvanism, with a sort of spectral and convulsive life. This existence, rendered insupportable to the monster by his vain craving after human sympathy, and by his consciousness of his own deformity, is employed in inflicting the most dreadful retribution upon the guilty philosopher. It is a parody on the creature man, powerful for evil, and the instrument of dreadful retribution on the student, who usurped the prerogative of the Creator.

Freeport, Sir Andrew. The name of one of the members of the imaginary club under whose direction the "Spectator" was professedly published. He is represented as a London merchant of great eminence and experience, industrious, sensible, and generous.

Friar Lawrence. The Franciscan monk who attempted to befriend the lovers in "Romeo and Juliet."

Friar's Tale, The. In The Canterbury Tales, Chaucer. An arch-deacon employed a sumpnour as his secret spy to find out offenders, with the view of exacting fines from them. In order to accomplish this more effectually, the sumpnour entered into a compact with the Devil, disguised as a yeoman. Those who imprecated the Devil were to be dealt with by the yeoman-devil, and those who imprecated God were to be the sumpnour's share.

Friar Tuck. Chaplain and steward of Robin Hood. Introduced by Sir Walter Scott in "Ivanhoe." He is a self-indulgent, combative Falstaff, a jolly companion to the outlaws in Sherwood Forest.

Frol'lo, Archdeacon Claude. A noted character in Victor Hugo's "Notre-Dame de Paris," absorbed in a bewildering search after philosopher's stone.

Front de Bœuf. Ivanhoe, Sir W. Scott. A follower of Prince John of Anjou, and one of the knight's challengers.

Froth, Master. A foolish gentleman in Shakespere's "Measure for Measure." His name explains his character.

Fudge Family. A name under which the poet Moore satirized the absurdities of his traveling countrymen, who, having been long confined at home by the wars waged by Napoleon flocked to the continent after his defeat at Waterloo. The family is composed of a hack-writer and spy, his son, a young dandy of the first water, and his daughter, a sentimental damsel, and Madame Le Roy, in love with a Parisian linen-draper, whom she has mistaken for one of the Bourbons in disguise. There is also a tutor and "poor relation" of this egregious family, who is an ardent Bonapartist and Irish patriot.

Funk, Peter. A person employed at petty auctions to bid on articles put up for sale, in order to raise their price; probably so called from such a name having frequently been given when articles were brought in.

Fus'bos. Utopia, Sir Thomas Moore. Minister of state to Artaxaminous, King of Utopia.

Fy'rapel, Sir. The leopard, the nearest kinsman of King Lion, in the beast epic of "Reynard the Fox" (1498).

Ga'bri-el. The name of an angel described in the Scriptures as charged with the ministration of comfort and sympathy to man. In the New Testament, he is the herald of good tidings, declaring the coming of the predicted Messiah and of his forerunner. In Jewish and Christian tradition he is one of the seven archangels. Gabriel has the reputation, among the Rabbins, of being a distinguished linguist, having taught Joseph the seventy languages spoken at Babel. The Mohammedans hold him in even greater reverence than the Jews. He is called the spirit of truth, and is believed to have dictated the Koran to Mohammed. Milton posts him at "the eastern gate of paradise," as "chief of the angelic guards," keeping watch there. The Talmud describes him as the prince of fire, and as the spirit who presides over thunder.

Gads'hill. A companion of Sir John Falstaff, in the First Part of Shakespere's "King Henry IV."

Gal'ahad, Sir. A celebrated knight of the Round Table who achieved the quest of the Holy Grail. Tennyson has made him the subject of one of his idylls. In Malory he is also represented as the perfect knight clad in wonderful armor. He was the only knight who could sit in the "Siege Perilous" a seat reserved for the "knight without a flaw," who achieved the quest of the holy grail.

Gal'apas. A giant of marvelous height in the army of Lucius, King of Rome. He was slain by King Arthur.

Gal-a-te'a. A sea nymph beloved by the Cyclops Polyphemus, who in his jealous rage destroyed her lover Acis with a rock torn from the mountain side. W. S. Gilbert in his drama "Pygmalion and Galatea" represents the artist as creating a piece of sculpture so perfect that he loves it with such a passion that he awakens it into life.

Ga-laph'-ro-ne or Gal'a-fron. A king of Cathay and father of Angelica in Bojardo's "Orlando Innamorato" and Ariosto's "Furioso."

Gamp, Mrs. A nurse who is a prominent character in Dickens's novel of "Martin Chuzzlewit." She is celebrated for her constant reference to a certain Mrs. Harris, a purely imaginary person, for whose feigned opinions and utterances she professes the greatest respect, in order to give the more weight to her own.

Gan, Ga-ne-lo'ne, Ga'ne-lon' or Ga'no. A count of Mayence, and one of the Paladins of Charlemagne, whom he betrayed at the battle of Ronces valles; always represented as a traitor, engaged in intrigues for the destruction of Christianity. He figures in the romantic poems of Italy, and is placed by Dante in his "Inferno."

Gander-Cleugh, "folly-cliff," that mysterious place where a person makes a goose of himself, in "Tales of My Landlord," Sir Walter Scott.

Gan'elon. The character of Sir Ganelon was marked with spite, dissimulation, and intrigue, but he was patient, obstinate, and enduring. He loved solitude, disbelieved in the existence of moral good, and has become a by-word for a false and faithless friend. Dante has placed him in his "Inferno."

Garcia, Pedro. A mythical personage, of whom mention is made in the preface to Gil Blas, in which is related how two scholars of Salamanca discovered a tombstone with the inscription, "Here lies interred the soul of the Licentiate Pedro Garcia," and how, on digging beneath the stone, was found a leathern purse containing a hundred ducats.

Gar'eth. In Arthurian romance a knight of the Round Table, who was first a scullion in King Arthur's kitchen, but afterwards became champion of the Lady Linet, or Lynette, whose sister Lionès, or Lyonors, he delivered from Castle Perilous.

Gargamelle'. The mother of Gargantua in Rabelais' celebrated romance of this name.

Gar-gan'tu-a. The hero of Rabelais' celebrated romance of the same name, a gigantic personage, about whom many wonderful stories are related. He lived for several centuries, and at last begot a son, Pantagruel, as wonderful as himself. The "Pleasant Story of the Giant Gargantua and of his Son Pantagruel," so satirized the monastic orders of his time that it was denounced by the spiritual authorities. Francis I., however, protected the author, and allowed him to print the third part of it in 1545.

Gargan'tuan. Enormous, inordinate, great beyond all limits. The word refers to the hero of the romance Gargantua.

Gar'gery, Mrs. Joe. Great Expectations, Dickens. Pip's sister. A virago, who kept her husband and Pip in constant awe. Joe Gargery, a blacksmith, married to Pip's sister. A noble-hearted, simple-minded young man, who loved Pip sincerely. Joe Gargery was one of nature's gentlemen.

Gaspar or Caspar (the white one), one of the three Magi or kings of Cologne. His offering to the infant Jesus was frankincense, in token of divinity.

Gaunt, Griffith. Hero of a novel by Charles Reade, of same title.

Gavotte'. Name given to a certain dance common among people in the upper Alps.

Ga'wain, Sir. A nephew of King Arthur, and one of the most celebrated knights of the Round Table; noted for his sagacity and wonderful strength. He was surnamed "the courteous." His brothers were Agravaine, Gaheris, and Gareth.

Ge'bir. A legendary Eastern prince, said to have invaded Africa and to have given his name to Gibraltar. He is the subject of a poem of the same name by Walter Savage Landor.

Gael'lat'-ley, Da'vie. The name of a poor fool in Sir Walter Scott's novel of "Waverley."

Gen'e-vieve'. (1) The heroine of a ballad by Coleridge. (2) Under the form "Genoveva," the name occurs in a German myth as that of the wife of the Count Palatine Siegfried, in the time of Charles Martel. Upon false accusations her husband gave orders to put her to death, but the servant intrusted with the commission suffered her to escape into the forest of Ardennes, where she lay concealed, until by accident her husband discovered her retreat, and recognized her innocence. This legend is often repeated in the folk tales of Germany. Tieck and Miller have given in modern versions and Raupach has made it the subject of a drama.

Genev'ra. A lady in Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso." Her honor is impeached, and she is condemned to die unless a champion appears to do combat for her. Her lover, Ariodantes, answers the challenge, kills the false accuser, and weds the dame. Spenser has a similar story in the "Faëry Queen," and Shakespere availed himself of the main incident in his comedy of "Much Ado About Nothing." From Italian romances "Genevra" has been taken as subject of "The Mistletoe Bough," by T. Haynes Bayley, and as both title and subject of a metrical tale by Samuel Rogers, in which he tells of a young Italian, who, upon her wedding-day, secreted herself, from motives of frolic, in a self-locking oaken chest, the lid of which shut down and held her captive. Many years afterward the chest was opened and revealed the skeleton.

Ge'nii. Protecting spirits or tutelar deities analagous to the guardian angels of the Christian faith. The Persian and Indian genii had a corporeal form, which they could change at pleasure. They were not attendant spirits, but fallen angels. They were naturally hostile to man, though compelled sometimes to serve them as slaves. The Roman genii were guardian spirits, unseen but helpful.

Georg'ics. A bucolic poetical composition, treating of farm-husbandry and the tillage of the soil. The most famous example of the kind is that by Virgil, 31 B. C., in four books.

Ge-rain't, Sir. One of the knights of the Round Table. His story is told in Tennyson's "Idylls of the King" under "Geraint and Enid."

Ger'aldine. A name frequently found in romantic poetry. The name is said to have been adopted from the heroine, connected with Surrey, whose praises he celebrates in a famous sonnet, and who has been the occasion of much controversy among his biographers and critics. There is no doubt that the lady called Geraldine was an Irish lady named Elizabeth Fitzgerald, the daughter of Gerald Fitzgerald. This sonnet led to the adoption of the name into the class of romantic names.

Gertrude of Wyoming. Heroine of a poem by Thomas Campbell.

Giao'ur. Byron's tale called "The Giaour" is represented as told by a fisherman, a Turk, who had committed a crime which haunted him all his life. See Hassan.

Ges'ta Romano'rum. Compiled by Pierre Bercheur, prior of the Benedictine Convent of St. Eloi, Paris. A collection of old romances which has been the storehouse for our best story writers. Shakespere, Spenser, Gower, and many later writers have gone to this source. It took its present form in England about the beginning of the Fourteenth Century, the foundation coming from Roman writers to which were added moralizing paragraphs and sometimes other religious and mystical tales.

Gib'bie, Goose. A half-witted boy in Scott's "Old Mortality."

Gib'bie, Sir. A simple-hearted, fine character in George Macdonald's novel by the same name.

Giant Despair. Pilgrim's Progress, Bunyan. A giant who is the owner of Doubting Castle, and who, finding Christian and Hopeful asleep upon his grounds, takes them prisoners, and thrusts them into a dungeon.

Giant Grim. A giant who seeks to stop the march of the pilgrims to the Celestial City, but is slain in a duel by Mr. Great-heart, their guide. Giant Slay-good. A giant slain in a duel by Mr. Great-heart.

Gil Blas. The title of a famous romance by LeSage, and the name of its hero. The tale is full of adventures and Gil Blas is represented as squire to a lady and brought up by his uncle, canon Gil Peres. Gil Blas went to Dr. Godinez's school of Oviedo and gained the name of being a great scholar. He had fair abilities and good inclinations, but was easily led astray by his vanity, full of wit and humor, but lax in his morals. Duped at first, he afterwards played the same devices on others. As he grew in years, his conduct improved, and when his fortune was made he became an honest man.

Gil'pin, John. A citizen of London, and "a train-band captain," whose adventures are related in Cowper's humorous poem, "John Gilpin's Ride." After being married twenty years his wife proposed a holiday, they agreed to make a family party, and dine at the Bell, at Edmonton. Mrs. Gilpin, her sister, and four children went in the chaise, and Gilpin promised to follow on horseback. The horse being fresh, began to trot, and then to gallop, and John a bad rider grasped the mane with both his hands. On went the horse, off flew John Gilpin's cloak, together with his hat and wig. He flew through Edmonton, and never stopped till he reached Ware, when his friend the calender, furnished him with another hat and wig, and Gilpin galloped back again, till the horse stopped at his house in London.

Glaucus. A fisherman of Boeotia who has become the fisherman's patron deity.

Glaucus, son of Hippolytus. Being smothered in a tub of honey, he was restored to life by Esculapios.

Glo'ri-a'na. In Spenser's "Faëry Queen," the "greatest glorious queen of Faëry land."

Gloss. In Biblical criticism, an explanation of purely verbal difficulties of the text, to the exclusion of those which arise from doctrinal, historical, ritual, or ceremonial sources. From an early period, these verbal difficulties were the object of attention, and the writers who devoted themselves to the elucidation were called "glossatores," and their works "glossaria."

Glumdal'ca. Tom Thumb, Fielding. Queen of the giants, captive in the court of King Arthur.

Glum-dal'clitch. Gulliver's Travels, Swift. A girl nine years old "and only forty feet high." Being such a "little thing," the charge of Gulliver was committed to her during his sojourn in Brobdingnag.

Glumms. Peter Wilkins, Robert Pullock. The male population of the imaginary country Nosmnbdsgrsutt, visited by Peter Wilkins. Both males and females had wings which served both for flying and for clothes.

Gnome. (1) A pithy and sententious saying commonly in verse, embodying some moral sentiment or precept. The gnome belongs to the same generic class with the proverb: but it differs from a proverb in wanting the common and popular acceptance. The use of gnomes prevailed among all the early nations, especially the Orientals, and the literatures of most countries abound with them. In the Bible, the book of Proverbs, part of Ecclesiastes, and still more the apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus, present numberless illustrations of the highest form of this composition. (2) In ancient times the name gnome represented one of the classes of imaginary beings which are supposed to be the presiding spirits in the mysterious operations of nature in the mineral and vegetable world.

Gob'bo, Launcelot. A clown in Shakespere's "Merchant of Venice." He left the service of Shylock the Jew for that of Bassanio a Christian. Launcelot Gobbo is one of the famous clowns of Shakespere.

Gob'bo, Old. Father to Launcelot Gobbo in "Merchant of Venice." He was stone blind.

Go'blins and Bogles. Familiar demons of popular superstition, a spirit which lurks about houses. It is also called hobgoblin. Goblin is used in a serious sense by Shakespere in "Hamlet," where the ghost is supposed to be a "spirit of health or goblin damned."

God Save the King. The national anthem of Great Britain, and by adoption that of Prussia and the German states. Its words are apparently imitated from the Domine Salvum of the Catholic Church service.

Gold Bug, The. Found in Poe's most successful tale, by same name. Scene laid on Sullivan's Island, near Charleston, S. C., and the cipher made to concern Captain Kidd's buried treasure.

Golden Legend, The. The title of an ecclesiastical work in 177 sections, dating from the Thirteenth Century, written by one James de Voragine, a Dominican monk, and descriptive of the various saints' days in the Roman Calendar. It is deserving of study as a literary monument of the period, and as illustrating the religious habits and views of the Christians of that time.

Gold of Nibelungen, The. Unlucky wealth. "To have the gold of Nibelungen" is to have a possession which seems to bring a curse with it. Icelandic Edda.

Gon'eril. The oldest of the three daughters to King Lear, in Shakespere's tragedy. Having received her moiety of Lear's kingdom, the unnatural daughter first abridged the old man's retinue, then gave him to understand that his company was not wanted and sent him out a despairing old man to seek refuge where he could find it. Her name is proverbial for filial ingratitude.

Gon-za'lo. An honest old counselor in Shakespere's "Tempest," a true friend to Prospero.

Goody Blake. A character in Wordsworth's poem entitled "Goody Blake and Harry Gill." A farmer forbids old Goody Blake to carry home a few sticks, which she had picked up from his land, and in revenge she invokes upon him the curse that he may "never more be warm": and ever after "his teeth they chatter, chatter still."

Goody Two-Shoes. The name of a well-known character in a nursery tale by Oliver Goldsmith. Goody Two-Shoes was a very poor child, whose delight at having a pair of shoes was unbounded. She called constant attention to her "two shoes" which gave her the name.

Gordian Knot. A great difficulty. Gordius, a peasant, chosen King of Phrygia, dedicated his wagon to Jupiter, and fastened the yoke with a rope so ingeniously that no one could untie it. Alexander was told that "whoever undid the knot would become king" and he cut the knot with his sword.

Gra'ci-o'sa. A princess in an old and popular fairy tale—the object of the ill-will of a step-mother named Grognon, whose malicious designs are perpetually thwarted by Percinet, a fairy prince, who is in love with Graciosa.

Graal, Gral, or Greal (a word derived probably from the old French, perhaps Celtic, "gréal"). In the legends and poetry of the Middle Ages, we find accounts of the Holy Graal—San Gréal—a miraculous chalice, made of a single precious stone, sometimes said to be an emerald, which possessed the power of preserving chastity, prolonging life, and other wonderful properties. It is fabled to have been preserved and carried to England by Joseph of Arimathea. It remained there many years, an object of pilgrimage and devotion, but at length it disappeared, one of its keepers having violated the condition of strict virtue in thought, word, and deed, which was imposed upon those who had charge of it. The quest of this cup forms the most fertile source of adventures to the knights of the Round Table. The story of the Sangreal or Sangraal was first written in verse by Troyes (end of the Tenth Century), thence into Latin, and finally turned into French prose by order of Henry III. It commences with the genealogy of our Saviour, and details the whole Gospel history: but the prose romance begins with Joseph of Arimathea. Its quest is continued in Percival, a romance of the Fifteenth Century. The legend of the graal was introduced into German poetry in the Thirteenth Century by Wolfram von Eschenbach, who took Guiot's tales of Parcival and Titarel as the foundation of his poem, but filled it with deep allegorical meanings.

Grad'grind. A hardware merchant in Dickens's "Hard Times." He is a man of hard facts and cultivates the practical. His constant demand in conversation is for "facts." He allows nothing for the weakness of human nature, and deals with men and women as a mathematician with his figures.

Grad'grind, Mrs. Wife of Thomas Gradgrind. A little thin woman, always taking physic, without receiving from it any benefit.

Grad'grind, Tom. Son of the above, a sullen young man, much loved by his sister.

Grad'grind, Louise. A faithful daughter and sister.

Gran'di-son, Sir Charles. The hero of Richardson's novel "The History of Sir Charles Grandison." Designed to represent his ideal of a perfect hero—a union of the good Christian and the perfect English gentleman.

Gratia'no'. A friend to Antonio and Bassanio in Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice." He "talks an infinite deal of nothing, more than any man in Venice." (2) Brother to Brabantio, in Shakespeare's tragedy of "Othello." (3) A character in the Italian popular theater called "Commedia dell'Arte." He is represented as a Bolognese doctor, and has a mask with a black nose and forehead and red cheeks.

Gray, Auld Rob'in. The title of a popular Scotch ballad written by Lady Anne Lindsay, and name of its hero. Auld Robin Gray was a good old man married to a poor young girl whose lover was thought to have been lost at sea, but who returns to claim her hand a month after her marriage.

Great'-heart, Mr. In Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," the guide of Christian's wife and children upon their journey to the Celestial City.

Gre'mio. In Shakespeare's "Taming of the Shrew," an old man who wishes to wed Bianca.

Gren'del. Beowulf. An Anglo-Saxon epic. The half-brute, half-man monster from which Beowulf delivered Hrothgar, King of Denmark. Night after night Grendel crept stealthily into the palace called Heorot, and slew sometimes as many as thirty of the inmates. At length Beowulf, at the head of a mixed band of warriors, went against it and slew it.

Griffin. A chimerical creature, which the fancy of the modern has adopted from that of the ancient world. The Griffin is variously described and represented, but the shape in which it most frequently appears is that of an animal having the body and legs of the lion with the beak and wings of the eagle. Like all other monsters, griffins abound in the legendary tales of the Teutonic nations. (Same as Gryphon.)

Griffin-feet. Fairy Tales, Comtesse D'Aunoy. The mark by which the Desert Fairy was known in all her metamorphoses.

Grimalkin. A cat, the spirit of a witch. Any witch was permitted to assume the body of a cat nine times.

Grimwig. Oliver Twist, Dickens. An irascible old gentleman, who hid a very kind heart under a rough exterior. He was always declaring himself ready to "eat his head" if he was mistaken on any point on which he passed an opinion.

Gri-sel'da, The Patient. A lady in Chaucer's "Clerk of Oxenford's Tales" immortalized by her virtue and her patience. The model of womanly and wifely obedience, she comes victoriously out of cruel and repeated ordeals. The story of Griselda is first told in the Decameron. Boccaccio derived the incidents from Petrarch, who seems to have communicated them also to Chaucer, as the latter refers to Petrarch as his authority.

Grub Street, London, is thus described in Dr. Johnson's Dictionary; "Originally the name of a street near Moorfields, in London, much inhabited by writers of small histories, dictionaries, and temporary poems, whence any production is called Grub Street." The name in its appropriate sense, was freely used by Pope, Swift, and others.

Grundy. "What will Mrs. Grundy say?" What will our rivals or neighbors say? The phrase is from Tom Morton's "Speed the Plough," but "Mrs. Grundy" is not introduced into the comedy as one of the "dramatis personæ." The solicitude of Dame Ashfield, in this play, as to "what will Mrs. Grundy say," has given the latter great celebrity, the interrogatory having acquired a proverbial currency.

Gu'drun. Edda, Samund Sigfusson. A lady married to Sigurd by the magical arts of her mother: and on the death of Sigurd to Atli (Attila), whom she hated for his cruelty, and murdered. She then cast herself into the sea, and the waves bore her to the castle of King Jonakun, who became her third husband.

Gu'drun. North-Saxon poem. A model of heroic fortitude and pious resignation. She was the daughter of King Hettel (Attila), and the betrothed of Herwig, King of Heligoland.

Guen'dolen. A fairy whose mother was a human being.

Guil'den-stern. The name of a courtier in Shakespeare's tragedy, Hamlet.

Gul'li-ver, Lemuel. The imaginary hero of Swift's celebrated satirical romance known as "Gulliver's Travels." He is represented as being first a surgeon in London, and then a captain of several ships. After having followed the sea for some years he makes in succession four extraordinary voyages.

Gup'py, Mr. Bleak House, Dickens. A weak, commonplace youth, who has the conceit to propose to Esther Summerson, the ward in Chancery.

Gurth. Ivanhoe, Sir Walter Scott. The swine-herd of Rotherwood.

Gur'ton, Gammer. The heroine of an old English comedy, long supposed to be the earliest in the language, but now ranked as the second in point of time.

Guy'on. The impersonation of Temperance or Self-government in Spenser's "Faëry Queen." He destroyed the witch Acra'sia, and her bower, called the "Bower of Bliss." His companion was Prudence. "Sir Guyon represents the quality of Temperance in the largest sense: meaning the virtuous self-government which holds in check not only the inferior sensual appetites but also the impulses of passion and revenge."

Guy, Sir, Earl of Warwick. The hero of a famous English legend, which celebrates the wonderful achievements by which he obtained the hand of his lady-love, the Fair Felice, as well as the adventures he subsequently met with in a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. He is reputed to have lived in the reign of the Saxon King Athelstan. The romance of Sir Guy, mentioned by Chaucer in the "Canterbury Tales," cannot be traced further back than the earlier part of the Fourteenth Century. His existence at any period is very doubtful.

Guy Mannering. The second of Scott's historical novels. It contains the excellent characters, Dandy Dinmont, the shrewd and witty counselor Pleydell, the desperate seabeaten villainy of Hatteraick, the uncouth devotion of that gentlest of all pedants poor Domine Sampson, and the savage crazed superstition of the gypsy-dweller in Dernelough.

Ha'dad. One of the six Wise Men led by the guiding star to Jesus.

Ha'gen. The murderer of Siegfried, in the German epic, the "Nibelungenlied." He is a pale-faced dwarf, who knows everything and whose sole desire is mischief. After the death of Siegfried he seized the "Nibelung hoard," and buried it in the Rhine, intending to appropriate it. Kriemhild invited him to the court and had him slain.

Hai-dee'. A beautiful young Greek girl in Byron's poem, "Don Juan." She is called the "beauty of the Cyclades."

Ha'kim. The Talisman, Scott. Saladin, in the disguise of a physician, visited Richard Cœur de Lion in sickness: gave him a medicine in which the "talisman" had been dipped, and the sick king recovered.

Ham'let. In Shakespeare's tragedy of the same name, son to the former, and nephew to the reigning King of Denmark. The ghost of his father appears to him, and urges him to avenge his murder upon his uncle. But the prince feigns madness, and puts off his revenge from day to day by "thinking too precisely on the event." Hamlet's mother had married Claudius, King of Denmark, after the death of her former husband. Claudius prepared poisoned wine, which he intended for Hamlet: but the queen, not knowing it was poisoned, drank it and died. Hamlet, seeing his mother fall dead, rushed on the king and killed him almost by accident, and is killed himself by a poisoned rapier in the hands of Laertes. (See "Ophelia.")

Hans von Rip'pach. A fictitious personage, to ask for whom was a joke among German students.

Hans'wurst. A pantomimic character formerly introduced into German comedies. It corresponds to the Italian "Macaroni," the French "Jean Potage," and the English "Jack Pudding."

Hard'cas'tle, Mr. A character in Goldsmith's comedy of "She Stoops to Conquer," represented as prosy and hospitable.

Hardcastle, Mrs. A very "genteel" lady indeed. Tony Lumpkin is her son by a former husband.

Hard Times. A novel by Dickens, dramatized under the title of "Under the Earth" or "The Sons of Toil." Bounderby, a street Arab, raised himself to banker and cotton prince. When past fifty years of age, he married Louisa, daughter of Thomas Gradgrind. The bank was robbed, and Bounderby believed Stephen Blackpool to be the thief, because he had dismissed him from his employ. The culprit was Tom Gradgrind, the banker's brother-in-law, who escaped out of the country. In the dramatized version, the bank was not robbed, but Tom removed the money to another drawer for safety.

Har'le-quin. The name of a well-known character in the popular extemporized Italian comedy.

Har'lowe, Cla-ris'sa. The heroine of Richardson's novel entitled "The History of Clarissa Harlowe." In order to avoid a marriage urged upon her by her parents, she casts herself on the protection of Lovelace, who grossly abuses the confidence thus reposed in him. He subsequently proposes to marry her, but Clarissa rejects the offer.

Har'old, Childe. Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, Byron. A man of gentle birth and peerless intellect, who exhausted all the pleasures of youth and early manhood, and loathed his fellow-bacchanals and the "laughing dames in whom he did delight." To banish his disgust and melancholy, he determines to travel: but, though he traverses some of the fairest portions of the earth, the feelings of bitterness and desolation still prey upon him.

Haroun'-al-Raschid. Caliph of the Abbasside race, contemporary with Charlemagne, and, like him, a patron of literature and the arts. Many of the tales in the "Arabian Nights" are placed in the caliphate of Haroun-al-Raschid.

Har-pa'gon'. The hero of Molière's comedy of "L'Avare," represented as a wretched miser.

Har'pi-er or Har'per. Some mysterious personage referred to by the witches in Shakespeare's tragedy, "Macbeth."

Hass'an. The Giaour, Byron. Caliph of the Ottoman Empire, noted for his hospitality and splendor. In his seraglio was a beautiful young slave named Leila, who loved a Christian called the Giaour. Leila is put to death by an emir, and Hassan is slain by the Giaour. Caliph Hassan has become the subject of popular romance.

Hassan, Al. The Arabian emir of Persia, father of Hinda, in Moore's "Fire-worshippers."

Hat'to. In German legend, an Archbishop of Mentz in the Tenth Century, who, for his hard-heartedness to the poor in time of famine, was eaten by mice in the "Mouse Tower" on an island in the Rhine near Bingen. Robert Browning has made this legend the subject of a poem.

Have'lock the Dane. A fisherman, known as Grim, rescued an infant named Havelock, whom he adopted. This infant was the son of the King of Denmark, and when the boy was restored to his royal sire Grim was laden with gifts. He built the town which he called after his own name. This is the foundation of the mediæval tales about "Havelock the Dane."

Hazlewood, Sir Robert. The old baronet of Hazlewood.

Hazlewood, Charles. Guy Mannering, Scott. Son of Sir Robert. In love with Lucy Bertram, whom he marries.

Heart of Mid-lo'thi-an. The tolbooth, or old jail of Edinburgh, Midlothian being the old name of Edinburgh County. It is the title of one of Sir Walter Scott's novels.

Heep, Uri'ah. David Copperfield, Dickens. A detestable character who, under the garb of the most abject humility, conceals a diabolic malignity. Mrs. Heep, Uriah's mother, was a character equally to be despised for her hypocritical assumption of humility.

Hel's or Hela's Kingdom. Frequent allusions in Norse poetry to the kingdom of the lower world. Many of its descriptions are said to be a source from which our Puritan ancestors derived images of the region of the unhappy dead.

Hel'e-na. (1) A lady in Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," in love with Demetrius. (2) The heroine of Shakespeare's "All's Well that Ends Well," in love with Bertram, who marries her against his will and leaves her, but is finally won by the strength of her affection. (3) A character in an old popular tale, reproduced in Germany by Tieck.

Her'mann and Dor'o-the'a. The hero and heroine of Goethe's poem of the same name.

Her'megild. Canterbury Tales, Chaucer. The wife of the lord-constable of Northumberland. She was converted by Constance, but was murdered by a knight. Hermegild at the bidding of Constance restored sight to a blind Briton.

Her'mi-a. A lady in Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," in love with Lysander.

Her-mi'o-ne. The heroine of the first three acts of Shakespeare's "Winter's Tale."

Her-na'ni or Er-na'ni. The hero of Victor Hugo's tragedy of the same name, and of Verdi's opera, founded on the play. He was a Spanish noble in revolt against the Emperor Charles V. and killed himself from a high sense of honor.

He'ro and Le-an'der. A pair of lovers in a late Greek poem. Hero dwelt on the Hellespont and Leander, who lived opposite, swam the strait to visit her. He was drowned, and Hero, in grief, cast herself into the sea.

Hex'am, Lizzie. The heroine of Dickens's novel, "Our Mutual Friend."

Hiawa'tha. A mythical person believed by the North American Indians to have been sent among them to clear their rivers, forests, and fishing-grounds, and to teach them the arts of peace. When the white man came then Hiawatha knew that the time of his departure was at hand, when he must go "to the kingdom of Ponemah, the land of the Hereafter." Longfellow gathered these myths from the Algonquin legends

Hil'de-brand. The nestor of German romance, a magician and champion.

Hil'da. A New England girl of the most sensitive delicacy and purity of mind, in Hawthorne's romance, "The Marble Faun." She is an artist, living in Rome, and typifies perhaps the conscience.

Hil'desheim. In an old German legend, the monk of Hildesheim, doubting how a thousand years with God could be "only one day," listened to the melody of a bird, as he supposed, for only three minutes, but found that he had been listening to it for a hundred years.

Hob'bi-did'ance. The name of one of the fiends mentioned by Shakespeare in "Lear," and taken from the history of the Jesuits' impostures.

Hod'e-kin. A famous German kobold, or domestic fairy-servant: so called because he always wore a little felt hat pulled down over his face.

Hol'o-fer'nes. (1) A pedant living in Paris, under whose care Gargantua is placed for instruction. (2) A pedantic schoolmaster in Shakespeare's "Love's Labor's Lost."

Holt, Felix. The hero of George Eliot's novel by the same name.

Hom'ilies. The later entries in the Peterborough "Chronicle" and a few homilies are almost all that we have left of the literature of the Twelfth Century. Some of these homilies are copied or imitated from those of Ælfric.

Hon'ey-comb', Will. One of the members of the imaginary club by whom the "Spectator" was professedly edited. He is distinguished for his graceful affectation, courtly pretension, and knowledge of the gay world.

Honeyman, Charles. A fashionable preacher in Thackeray's novel, "The Newcomes."

Hope'ful. A pilgrim in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," who accompanies Christian to the end of his journey.

Hop'-o'-my-Thumb'. A character in the tales of the nursery. Tom Thumb and Hop-o'-my-Thumb are not the same, although they are often confounded. Tom Thumb was the son of peasants, knighted by King Arthur, and was killed by a spider. Hop-o'-my-Thumb was a nix, the same as the German "daumling," the French "le petit ponce," and the Scotch "Tom-a-lin" or "Tamlane." He was not a human dwarf, but a fay.

Hora'tio. Hamlet, Shakespeare. An intimate friend of Hamlet, a prince, a scholar, and a gentleman.

Hora'tius, Cocles. Captain of the bridge-gate over the Tiber. He and two men to help him held the bridge against vast approaching armies. Subject and title of a poem by Lord Macaulay.

Hornbook. The primer or apparatus for learning the elements of reading, used in England before the days of printing, and common down to the time of George II. It consisted of a single leaf, containing on one side the alphabet, large and small, in black letter or in Roman, with perhaps a small regiment of monosyllables. Then followed a form of exorcism and the Lord's Prayer, and, as a finale, the Roman numerals. The leaf was usually set in a frame of wood, with a slice of transparent horn in front — hence the name of "horn-book." Copies of the hornbook are now exceedingly rare.

Hor'ner, Jack. The name of a celebrated personage in the literature of the nursery. A Somersetshire tradition says that the plums which Jack Horner pulled out of the Christmas pie alluded to the title deeds of the abbey estates at Wells, which were sent to Henry VIII. in a pasty, and abstracted on the way by the messenger, a certain Jack Horner.

Hortense'. Bleak House, Dickens. The vindictive French maid-servant of Lady Dedlock. In revenge for the partiality shown by Lady Dedlock to Rosa, Hortense murdered Mr. Tulkinghorn, and tried to throw the suspicion of the crime on Lady Dedlock.

House of Fame. Of this poem it has been said that of itself it might have given fame to Chaucer. Under the form of a dream, it gives a picture of the "Temple of Glory," crowded with aspirants for immortal renown, and adorned with statues of great poets and historians.

Hous'sain. A prince in the "Arabian Nights" who had a flying carpet which would carry him whithersoever he wished.

Hubbard, Old Mother. A well-known nursery rhyme. "Mother Hubbard's Tale," by Edmund Spenser, is a satirical fable in the style of Chaucer.

Hu'bert de Burgh. Justice of England, created Earl of Kent, introduced by Shakespeare into "King John." He is the one to whom the young prince addresses his piteous plea for life. The lad was found dead soon afterwards, either by accident or foul play.

Hu'bert, Saint. The legend of Saint Hubert makes him a patron saint of huntsmen.

Hu'di-bras. The title and hero of a celebrated satirical poem by Samuel Butler. Hudibras is a Presbyterian justice of the time of the Commonwealth.

Hugh of Lincoln. A legendary personage who forms the subject of Chaucer's "Prioress's Tale," and also of an ancient English ballad. Wordsworth has given a modernized version of this tale.

Hu'go Hug'onet. Castle Dangerous, Scott. Minstrel of the Earl of Douglas.

Hum'phrey. The imaginary collector of the tales in "Master Humphrey's Clock," by Charles Dickens.

Hump'ty Dump'ty. The hero of a well-known nursery rhyme. The name signifies humped and dumpy, and is the riddle for an egg.

Hu'on of Bordeaux, Sir. A hero of one of the romances of chivalry bearing this name.

Hur'al Oyun'. In the fairy tales found in the Koran, these are the black-eyed daughters of paradise. They are created from muck and are free from all physical weakness and are always young. It is held out to every male believer that he will have seventy-two of these girls as his household companions in paradise.—From the Koran.

Hy'las. A beautiful boy, beloved by Hercules, who was drawn into a spring by the enamored nymphs. The story has been treated by Bayard Taylor, and by William Morris in his "Life and Death of Jason."

Hypatia. Of this romance its author, Charles Kingsley, said; "My idea in the romance is to set forth Christianity as the only really democratic creed and philosophy: above all, spiritualism as the most exclusively aristocratic creed."

Hypapanti. The Feast of Purification is called Festum Hypapanti.

Hyperion or Hyperion. This myth has formed a favorite theme for English poets. In Keats' "Hyperion" nature and classic imagery are combined with exquisite delicacy.

Hypocrites' Isle. An island described by Rabelais in one of his satires. He pictures this island of "Hypocrites" as wholly inhabited by people of low and defiled natures, as, by sham saints, spiritual comedians, seducers, and "such-like sorry rogues who live on the alms of passengers like the hermit of Lamont."

Ia'go. Othello, Shakespeare. Othello's ensign and the villain of the play. Iago is said to be a character next to a devil, yet not quite a devil, which Shakespeare alone could execute without scandal.

Idleness, The Lake of. Faëry Queen, Spenser. Whoever drank thereof grew instantly "faint and weary." The Red Cross Knight drank of it, and was readily made captive by Orgoglio.

Idylls of the King. Tennyson has told the purpose and the meaning of these Idylls. Taken together they form a parable of the life of man. Each Idyll taken as a separate picture represents the war between Sense and Soul. In Lancelot and Guinevere the lower nature leads them astray and there is intense struggle before the higher nature prevails. In Vivien, Ettarre, Tristram, and Modred the base and sensual triumph. In Arthur, Sir Galahad and Percival, it is the victory of the spiritual.

Ignaro. Faëry Queen, Spenser. Foster-father of Orgoglio. Spenser says this old man walks one way and looks another, because ignorance is always "wrong-headed."

Il'iad. The tale of the siege of Troy, an epic poem in twenty-four books. It is written in Greek hexameters, and commemorates the deeds of Achilles and other Greek heroes at the siege of Troy. The date of its composition may, with much probability, be assigned to the Ninth Century B. C., and the poem is so deficient in continuity, and contains so much that is inconsistent and irrelevant with the main topic, that it has been thought by many critics to have been the performance of several persons, although its authorship is still nominally accredited to Homer. Books one, two, and three are introductory to the war. Paris proposes to decide the contest by single combat, and Menelaus accepts the challenge. Paris, being overthrown, is carried off by Venus, and Agamemnon demands that the Trojans should give up Troy in fulfillment of the compact, and the siege follows. The gods take part and frightful slaughter ensues. At length Achilles slays Hector and the battle is at an end. Old Priam, going to the tent of Achillès, craves the body of his son Hector; Achillès gives it up, and the poem concludes with the funeral rites of the Trojan hero. Virgil continues the tale from this point, shows how the city was taken and burnt, and then continues with the adventures of Æne'as, who escapes from the burning city, and makes his way to Italy.

Illuminating. The art of adorning manuscripts and books with ornamented letters and paintings, which was practiced in the Middle Ages, prior to the introduction of printing, by artists, generally monks, called "illuminators." Manuscripts, containing portraits, pictures, and emblematic figures, form a valuable part of the riches preserved in the principal libraries in Europe.

Im'o-gen. The wife of Posthumus, and the daughter of Cymbeline in the play of Shakespeare's under title Cymbeline. "Of all Shakespeare's women," says Hazlitt, "she is, perhaps, the most tender and the most artless."

Improvvisato'ri. Poets who utter verses without previous preparation on a given theme. Among the ancients, Greece was the land of improvisation. In modern times, it has been almost entirely confined to Italy, where Petrarch introduced the practice of singing improvised verses to the lute.

Incanta'tion. Is derived from a Latin root meaning simply "to sing." It is the term in use to denote one of the most powerful and awe-inspiring modes of magic, resting on a belief in the mysterious power of words solemnly conceived and passionately uttered.

Inchcape Rock. It is dangerous for navigators, and therefore the abbot of Aberbrothok fixed a bell on a float, which gave notice to sailors. Southey says that Ralph the Rover, in a mischievous joke, cut the bell from the buoy, and it fell into the sea, but on his return voyage his boat ran on the rock, and Ralph was drowned. Precisely the same tale is told of St. Goven's bell.

Infer'no, The. Divine Comedy, Dante. Epic poem in thirty-four cantos. Inferno is the place of the souls who are wholly given up to sin. The ascent is through Purgatorio to Paradiso.

Innocents Abroad. Twain. Travelers seeing Europe without any illusions. The fun consists in an irreverent application of modern commonsense to historic associations, ridiculing sentimental humbug. An air of innocence and surprise adds to the drolleries of their adventures.

Interludes, The. Springing from the Moralities and bearing some resemblance to them, though nearer the regular drama, are The Interludes, a class of compositions in dialogue, much shorter and more merry and farcical. They were generally played in the intervals of a festival.

Invocation. An address at the commencement of a poem, in which the author calls for the aid of some divinity, particularly of his muse.

Iphigeni'a. The heroine of Euripides' tragedy "Iphigenia in Aulis," and of Goethe's tragedy "Iphigenie auf Tauris." She was placed on the altar in a rash vow by her father. Artemis at the last moment snatched her from the altar and carried her to heaven, substituting a hind in her place. The similarity of this legend to the Scripture stories of Jephthah's vow and Abraham's offering of his son Isaac is noticeable.

I'ras. A strongly delineated character in "Ben Hur, a Tale of The Christ," by Lew Wallace.

Iras. A female attendant on Cleopatra in Shakespeare's play, "Antony and Cleopatra."

I'saac of York. A wealthy Jew, the father of Rebecca, in Sir Walter Scott's novel, "Ivanhoe."

Isabel'la. The heroine in Shakespeare's comedy, "Measure for Measure."

Is'lands of the Blest. Imaginary islands in the west. Hither the favorites of the gods were conveyed without dying, and dwelt in never-ending joy. The name first occurs in Hesiod's "Works and Days." This phrase is often used in modern literature.

I'sland of Lanterns. In the celebrated satire of Rabelais, an imaginary country inhabited by false pretenders to knowledge. The name was probably suggested by the "City of Lanterns," in the Greek romance of Lucian. Swift has copied this same idea in his Island of Laputa.

Is'land of St. Bran'dan. A marvelous flying island, the subject of an old and widely-spread legend of the Middle Ages. Though the Island of St. Brendan has been a disappointment to voyagers it has been a favorite theme with poets.

I-thu'ri-el. In Milton's "Paradise Lost," an angel commissioned by Gabriel to search through paradise, in company with Zephon, to find Satan, who had eluded the vigilance of the angelic guard, and effected an entrance into the garden. It is related that Ithuriel found Satan "squat like a toad, close at the ear of Eve," and transformed him by a touch of his spear to his proper shape.

I'van-hoe. The hero of Sir Walter Scott's novel of the same name. He figures as Cedric of Rotherwood's disinherited son, the favorite of King Richard I., and the lover of the Lady Rowena, whom, in the end, he marries. The scene is laid in England in the reign of Richard I., and we are introduced to Robin Hood in Sherwood Forest, banquets in Saxon halls, tournaments, and all the pomp of ancient chivalry. Rowena, the heroine, is quite thrown into the shade by the gentle, meek, yet high-souled Rebecca.

Iva'novitch, Ivan. An imaginary personage, who is the embodiment of the peculiarities of the Russian people, in the same way as John Bull represents the English, and Jean Crapaud the French character, and Brother Jonathan the American character.

I'vory Gate of Dreams. Dreams which delude pass through the ivory gate, but those which come true through the horn gate.

Jack and the Bean-Stalk. A nursery legend said to be an allegory of the Teutonic Al-fader: the "red hen" representing the all-producing sun, the "money-bags" the fertilizing rain, and the "harp" the winds.

Jack-in-the-Green. A prominent character in May-pole dances.

Jack Robinson. A famous comic song by Hudson.

Jack Sprat. The hero of a nursery rhyme. Jack and his wife form a fine combination in domestic economy.

Jack, the Giant-killer. The name of a famous hero in the literature of the nursery, the subject of one of the Teutonic or Indo-European legends, which have become nationalized in England and America.

Jaques. A lord attending upon the exiled duke, in Shakespeare's "As You Like It." A contemplative character who thinks and does — nothing. He is called the "melancholy Jaques," and affects a cynical philosophy. He could "suck melancholy out of a song, as a weasel sucks eggs."

Jaquenet'ta. Love's Labor's Lost, Shakespeare. A country wench courted by Don Adriano de Armado.

Jar'ley, Mrs. The proprietor of a waxwork show in Dickens's "Old Curiosity Shop." She has lent her name to a popular game of parlor tableaux.

Jarn'dyce. A prominent figure in Dickens's "Bleak House," distinguished for his philanthropy, easy good-nature and good sense, and for always saying, "The wind is in the east," when anything went wrong with him. The famous suit of "Jarndyce vs. Jarndyce," in this novel, is a satire upon the Court of Chancery.

Jar'vie, Baillie Nic'ol. A prominent character in Sir Walter Scott's novel "Rob Roy." He is a magistrate of Glasgow.

Jek'yll, Doctor, and Mr. Hyde. The duplex hero of Robert Louis Stevenson's singular romance of the same name. Doctor Jekyll is a benevolent and upright physician, who by means of a potion is able to transform himself for a time into a second personality, Mr. Hyde, of a brutal and animal nature.

Jel'ly-by, Mrs. A character in Dickens's novel "Bleak House," a type of sham philanthropy. She spends her time and energy on foreign missions to the neglect of her family. Mrs. Jellyby is quite overwhelmed with business correspondence relative to the affairs of Borrioboola Gha.

Jen'kins, Win'i-fred. The name of Miss Tabitha Bramble's maid in Smollett's "Expedition of Humphry Clinker." She makes ridiculous blunders in speaking and writing.

Jenkinson, Ephraim. A green old swindler, whom Dr. Primrose met in a public tavern. Dr. Primrose sold the swindler his horse, Old Blackberry, for a draft upon Farmer Flamborough.

Jeroboam Sermon. One of Dr. Emmons's sermons which made a great noise at the time. It was known as his Jeroboam Sermon. It was written on the occasion of Jefferson's inauguration as president, and although Jefferson is not named, the delineation of the character of Jeroboam is such that no one can doubt the personal application intended.

Jerusalem Delivered. An epic in twenty books, by Torquato Tasso (1544-1595). The crusaders, encamped on the plains of Tortosa, chose Godfrey for their chief, and Alandine, King of Jerusalem, made preparations of defense. The Christian army having reached Jerusalem, the King of Damascus sent Armi'da to beguile the Christians. It was found that Jerusalem could never be taken without the aid of Rinaldo. Godfrey, being informed that the hero was dallying with Armi'da in the enchanted island, sent to invite him back to the army; he returned, and Jerusalem was taken. Armi'da fled into Egypt, and offered to marry any knight who slew Rinaldo. The love of Rinaldo returned, he pursued her and she relented. The poem concludes with the triumphant entry of the Christian army into the Holy City, and their devotions at the tomb of the Redeemer. The two chief episodes are the loves of Olindo and Sophronia, and of Tancred and Corinda.

Jes'sa-my Bride. A by-name given to Miss Mary Horneck, afterward Mrs. Gwyn. She was a contemporary and friend of Goldsmith. Also title of a novel by F. F. Moore.

Jes'si-ca. The beautiful daughter of Shylock, in Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice."

Jew, The Wandering. An imaginary person in a legend connected with the history of Christ's passion. As the Saviour was on the way to the place of execution, overcome with the weight of the cross, he wished to rest on a stone before the house of a Jew, who drove him away with curses. Driven by fear and remorse, he has since wandered, according to the command of the Lord, from place to place, and has never yet been able to find a grave. Romances have been founded on this character ranking among the best in literature.

Jones, Tom. The hero of Fielding's novel entitled "The History of a Foundling," represented as a model of generosity, openness, and manly spirit, though thoughtless and dissipated.

Joy'euse, La. The sword of Charlemagne as mentioned in romances of chivalry.

Joyeuse' Garde, La. The residence of the famous Lancelot du Lac.

Juan, Don. A legendary personage made the hero of many dramatic romances and poems. (See Don Juan.)

Judith. The heroine in the book by the same name in the Apocrapha. She was a beautiful Jewess of Bethulia, who, when her town was besieged by Holofernes, the general of Nebuchadnezzar, attended him in his tent, and, when he was drunk, killed him, whereupon her townsmen fell upon the Assyrians and defeated them with great slaughter. The tale is not mentioned by Josephus, and has, from an early period, been held to be an allegory. It has frequently furnished poets and painters with subjects.

Kadr, Al. The night on which the "Korân" was sent down to Mahommed. Al Kadr is supposed to be the seventh of the last ten nights of Ramadan, or the night between the twenty-third and twenty-fourth days of the month.

Kay. A foster-brother of King Arthur, and a rude and boastful knight of the Round Table. He was the butt of King Arthur's court. Called also "Sir Queux." He appears in the "Boy and the Mantle," in Percy's "Reliques." Sir Kay is represented as the type of rude boastfulness, Sir Gawain of courtesy, Sir Lancelot of chivalry, Sir Mordred of treachery, Sir Galahad of chastity, Sir Mark of cowardice.

Ke-ha'ma. A Hindoo rajah, who obtains and sports with supernatural power. His adventures are related in Southey's poem entitled "The Curse of Kehama."

Kent, Earl of. A rough, plain-spoken, but faithful nobleman in Shakespeare's "King Lear," who follows the fallen fortunes of the king, disguised as a servant, under the assumed name of Caius.

Ken'wigs. A family in Dickens's novel "Nicholas Nickleby," including a number of little girls who differed from one another only in the length of their frilled pantalettes and of their flaxen pigtailed tied with bows of blue ribbon.

Kil-ken'ny Cats. Two cats, in an Irish story, which fought till nothing was left but their tails. It is probably a parable of a local contest between Kilkenny and Irishtown, which impoverished both boroughs.

King Cam-by'ses. The hero of "A Lamentable Tragedy" of the same name, by Thomas Preston, contemporary of Shakespeare. A ranting character known to modern readers by Falstaff's allusion to him in Shakespeare's first "Henry IV."

King Es'ter-mere. The hero of an ancient and beautiful legend, which, according to Bishop Percy, should seem to have been written while a great part of Spain was in the hands of the Saracens or Moors, whose empire was not fully extinguished before the year 1491.

King Horn. A metrical romance which was very popular in the Thirteenth Century. King Horn is a beautiful young prince who is carried away by pirates; but his life is spared, and after many wonderful adventures he weds a princess, and regains his father's kingdom.

King Log and King Stork. Characters in a celebrated fable of Æsop, which relates that the frogs, grown weary of living without government, petitioned Jupiter for a king. Jupiter accordingly threw down a log among them, which made a satisfactory ruler till the frogs recovered from their fright and discovered his real nature. They, therefore, entreated Jupiter for another king, whereupon he sent them a stork, who immediately began to devour them.

Klaus, Peter. The hero of an old popular tradition of Germany — the prototype of Rip Van Winkle — represented as a goatherd.

Knick'er-bock'er, Die'drich. The imaginary author of a humorous fictitious "History of New York," written by Washington Irving.

Knights of the Round Table. King Arthur's knights were so called because they sat with him at a round table made by Merlin for King Leodegraunce. This king gave it to Arthur on his marriage with Guinevere, his daughter.

Knight's Tale, The. Canterbury Tales, Chaucer. Two Theban knights, Palamon and Arcite, captives of Duke Theseus, used to see from their dungeon window the duke's sister-in-law, Emily, and fell in love with her. Both captives having gained their liberty, contended for the lady by single combat. Arcite was victor, but being thrown from his horse was killed, and Emily became the bride of Palamon.

Koppenberg. The mountain of Westphalia to which the pied piper (Bunting) led the children, when the people of Hamelin refused to pay him for killing their rats. Browning's poem, "The Pied Piper," tells the tale.

Kriemhild. A beautiful Burgundian lady, daughter of Dancrat and sister of Gunther. She first married Siegfried, King of the Netherlands, and next Etzel, King of the Huns. In the first part of the "Nibelungenlied," Kriemhild brings ruin on herself by a tattling tongue. In the second part of the great epic she is represented as bent on vengeance, and after a most terrible slaughter both of friends and foes, she is killed by Hildebrand.

Kubla Khan. Coleridge says that he composed the poem in a dream immediately after reading a description of the Khan Kubla's palace, and he wrote it down on awaking.

Lacædemonian Letter. The smallest of all letters (in Greek alphabet).

Laconic. Very concise and pithy. The name came from the Spartan manner of curt speech. A Spartan was called a Lacon from name of his country, Laconia.

Lady-day. The twenty-fifth day of March, anniversary of the Annunciation.

Lady of Lyons, The. Pauline Deschappelles, daughter of a Lyonesse merchant. She rejected the suits of Beauseant, Glavis, and Claude Melnotte, who therefore combined. Claude, who was a gardener's son, aided by the other two, passed himself off as Prince Como, married Pauline, and brought her home to his mother's cottage. The proud beauty was very indignant, and Claude left her to join the French army. He became a colonel, and returned to Lyons. He found his father-in-law on the eve of bankruptcy, and that Beauseant had promised to satisfy the creditors if Pauline would consent to marry him. Pauline was heartbroken; Claude revealed himself, paid the money required, and carried home the bride.

Lady of the Lake and Arthur's Sword. The Lady of the Lake gave to King Arthur the sword "Excalibur." She ordered King Arthur to sail out into the lake and take the sword as they could see it rising in the water. He sailed out with the knight and Merlin, came to the sword that a hand held up, and took it by the handles, and the arm and hand went under the lake again. This Lady of the Lake asked in recompense the head of Sir Balin, because he had slain her brother; but the king refused the request. Balin, who was present, exclaimed "Evil be ye found! Ye would have my head; therefore ye shall lose thine own." With his sword he smote off her head in the presence of King Arthur.

Lady of the Lake, The, much celebrated in the poem of Sir Walter Scott, was Ellen Douglas, once a favorite of King James; but when her father fell into disgrace, she retired with him into the vicinity of Loch Katrine.

Lagado. The name of a city belonging to the King of Laputa. Lagado is celebrated for its grand academy of projectors, who try to extract sunbeams from cucumbers, to calcine ice into gunpowder. In the description of this fancied academy, Swift ridicules the pretenders in philosophy and science.

Laertes was the son of Polonius, Lord-chamberlain of Denmark, and brother of Hamlet's beloved Ophelia. The king persuades him to challenge Hamlet, after Ophelia wanders in mind and he calls him out in "friendly" duel, but poisons his own rapier. He wounds Hamlet and in the scuffle which ensues, the combatants change swords, and Hamlet wounds Laertes, so that both die.

Lake of the Cat. Name given to Lake Erie until the last of the Seventeenth Century.

Lampoon. A personal satire, often bitter and malignant. These libels, carried to excess in the reign of Charles II., acquired the name of lampoons from the burden sung to them: "Lampone, lampone, camerada lampone."

Lake Poets, The. Wordsworth, Southey, and Coleridge, who lived about the lakes of Cumberland.

Lame Dog's Diary. The provincial life of a little English village is reflected in this clever diary, supposed to be kept by an invalid officer who returned, crippled, from the Boer War. The suggestion of the diary came from a winning, tantalizing young widow, who cheered the invalid by her amusing, paradoxical talk. The diarist and his sister Palestrina are true English types — quiet gentlefolk.

Lamps of Sleep. A wonderful knight of a mythical land had an equally wonderful Black Castle. In the mansion of the Knight of the Black Castle were seven lamps, which could be quenched only with water from an enchanted fountain. So long as these lamps kept burning, everyone within the room fell into a deep sleep, from which nothing could rouse them.

Land of Beulah. The paradise in which souls wait before the resurrection. In "Pilgrim's Progress" the land from which the pilgrims enter the Celestial City. The name is found in Isaiah lxii, 4.

Land of Bondage. Name given to Egypt in the Bible.

Land of Cakes. A name sometimes given to Scotland, because oatmeal cakes are a common national article of food, particularly among the poorer classes.

Land of Nod. In common speech sleepy-land or land of dreams.

Land of Promise. The land promised to Abraham — Canaan.

Land of Shadows. A place of unreality, sometimes meaning land of ghosts.

Land o' the Leal. An unknown land of happiness, loyalty, and virtue. Caroline Oliphant, Baroness Nairne, meant heaven in her song and this is now its accepted meaning. (Leal faithful, and "Land of the leal" means the land of the faithful.)

Land of Wisdom. A name given to Normandy, in France, because of the wise customs which have prevailed there, and also because of the skill and judgment of the people in making laws.

Land of Veda. Name often given to India.

Landlady's Daughter. She rowed Flemming "over the Rhine-stream, rapid and roaring wide," and told to him the story of the Liebenstein.

Lantern-Land. The land of literary charlatans, whose inhabitants, graduates in arts, doctors, professors, and artists of all grades, waste time in displaying their wonderful learning. The home of egotists.

Lantern of Demosthenes. This edifice, in Athens, stood in the street of the tripods, so called from the circumstance that in it were erected numerous tripods, which had been obtained as prizes in the musical or theatrical contests.

Laodice'an. One indifferent to religion, like the Christians of that Church mentioned in the Book of Revelation.

Laputa. The name of a flying island described by Swift in "Gulliver's Travels." It is said to be "exactly circular, its diameter 7,837 yards, or about four miles and a half, and consequently contains ten thousand acres." The inhabitants are chiefly speculative philosophers, devoted to mathematics and music; and such is their habitual absent-mindedness, that they are compelled to employ attendants — called "flappers" — to rouse them from their profound meditations. This is done by striking them gently on the mouth and ears with a peculiar instrument consisting of a blown bladder with a few pebbles in it, fastened on the end of a stick.

Last of the Mo'hicans. The Indian chief, Uncas, is so called by Cooper, in his novel of that title.

Latitudinarians. Persons who hold very loose views of Divine inspiration and what are called orthodox doctrines.

Laughing Philosopher, The. Democritus of Abdera, a celebrated philosopher of antiquity, contemporary with Socrates; so called because he made a jest of man's follies, sorrows, and struggles. He is contrasted with Heraclitus, "The Weeping Philosopher."

Launfal, Sir. Steward of King Arthur. Detesting Queen Guinevere, he retired to Carlyoun, and fell in love with a lady named Tryamour. She gave him an unfailing purse, and told him if he wished to see her, he was to retire into a private room, and she would be with him. Sir Launfal now returned to court, and excited much attention by his great wealth. Guinevere made advances to him, but he would not turn from the lady to whom he was devoted and lauded her praises. At this repulse, the angry queen complained to the king, and declared to him that she had been insulted by his steward. Arthur bade Sir Launfal produce this paragon of women. On her arrival, Sir Launfal was allowed to accompany her to the isle of Ole'ron; and no one ever saw him afterwards. . James Russell Lowell has a poem entitled "The Vision of Sir Launfal."

Lau'reate, Poet. An officer appointed by the crown to compose odes, etc., in honor of grand state occasions

The appellation seems to have originated in a custom of the English universities of presenting a laurel wreath to graduates; the new graduate being then styled "Poeta Laureatus." The king's laureate was simply a graduated rhetorician in the service of the king. R. Whittington, in 1512, seems to have been the last man who received a rhetorical degree at Oxford. The earliest mention of a poet-laureate in England occurs in the reign of Edward IV., when John Key received the appointment. In 1630, the first patent of the office was granted. The salary was fixed at £100 per annum, with a tierce of canary; which latter emolument was in Southey's time, commuted into an annual payment of £27. It used to be the duty of the laureate to write an ode on the birthday of the sovereign, and on the occasion of a national victory; but this custom was abolished towards the end of the reign of George III. The poets who have held this office are Edmund Spenser, 1591-1599; Samuel Daniel, 1599-1619; Ben Jonson, 1619-1637. Interregnum. William Davenant, Knight, 1660-1668; John Dryden, 1670-1689; Thomas Shadwell, 1689-1692; Nahum Tate, 1692-1715; Nicholas Rowe, 1715-1718; Lawrence Eusden, 1718-1730; Colley Cibber, 1730-1757; William Whitehead, 1757-1785; Thomas Warton, 1785-1790; Henry James Pye, 1790-1813; Robert Southey, 1813-1843; William Wordsworth, 1843-1850; Alfred Tennyson, 1850-1892, Alfred Austin, 1896.

Laus Deo. A poem by Whittier. Called forth by the passing of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery; suggested to the poet as he sat in the Friends' meeting-house in Amesbury, and listened to the bells proclaiming the fact.

Lavinia and Palemon. Lavinia was the daughter of Acasto, patron of Palemon. Through Acasto Palemon gained a fortune and wandered away from his friend. Acasto lost his property, and dying, left a widow and daughter in poverty. Palemon often sought them, but could never find them. One day, a lovely modest maiden came to glean in Palemon's fields. The young squire was greatly struck with her exceeding beauty and modesty, but she was known as a pauper and he dared not give her more than passing glance. Upon inquiry, he found that the beautiful gleaner was the daughter of Acasto; he proposed marriage, and Lavinia was restored to her rightful place.

Lavaine. Son of the Lord of As'tolat, who accompanied Sir Lancelot when he went to tilt for the ninth diamond. Lavaine is described as young, brave, and a true knight. He was brother to Elaine.

Lawyer's Alcove. Name given to a volume of poems selected from the best poems by lawyers, for lawyers, and about lawyers. Included in this volume are Shakespeare's "Sonnet CXXXIV"; Blackstone's "A Lawyer's Farewell to his Muse"; "Justice," by John Quincy Adams; Landor's "At the Buckingham Sessions"; "The Judicial Court of Venus," by Jonathan Swift; Saxe's "Briefless Barrister" and his "The Lawyer's Valentine"; "General Average," by William Allen Butler; "The Festival of Injustice" by Carlton, and Riley's "Lawyer and Child."

Lay of the Last Minstrel. Ladye Margaret [Scott] of Branksome Hall, the "flower of Teviot," was beloved by Baron Henry of Cranstown, but a deadly feud existed between the two families. A goblin lured Ladye Margaret's brother into a wood, where he fell into the hands of the Southerners. At the same time an army of 3,000 English marched to Branksome Hall to take it, but hearing that Douglas was on the march against them, the two chiefs agreed to decide the contest by single combat. Victory fell to the Scotch, when it was discovered that "Sir William Deloraine," the Scotch champion, was in reality Lord Cranstown, who then claimed and received the hand of Ladye Margaret as his reward. This united the two houses.

Lazarre. This hero's relation to history is so shadowy as to be no burden, and yet sufficiently well-defined to serve as a lure to the imagination. He is the supposed Dauphin of France, the son of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette, who, according to the full chronicles of his time, died in prison, but whose removal to America is hinted in certain footnotes to history. However this may have been, one Eleazar Williams, the reputed son of a half-breed Indian who lived in northern New York in the early years of the last century, was not without reason for believing himself the lost Dauphin. Mrs. Catherwood has written a romance under this name taking this character as her hero.

Lazy Lawrence. One of the dwellers in Lubberland in the story of which he is pictured. It tells of his birth and breeding, how he served the school-master, his wife, the squire's cook, and the farmer, which, by the laws of Lubberland, was accounted high treason; his arraignment and trial, and happy deliverance from the many treasons laid to his charge.

Leander. The story of Hero and Leander is so old and so well known as to nearly belong to mythology. A young man of Abydos, who swam nightly across the Hellespont to visit his lady-love, Hero, a priestess of Sestos. One night he was drowned in his attempt, and Hero leaped into the Hellespont also.

Lear. A fabulous or legendary King of Britain, and the hero of Shakespeare's tragedy of the same name. He had three daughters, and when four score years old, wishing to retire from the active duties of sovereignty, resolved to divide his kingdom between them. By elaborate but false professions of love and duty on the part of two daughters (Goneril and Regan), King Lear was persuaded to disinherit the third (Cordelia), who had before been deservedly more dear to him, and to divide his kingdom between her sisters. The tragedy is wrought out in the ungrateful conduct of the older sisters and the suffering of Lear. The beauty of the play in the exquisite character Cordelia, who is in every respect a "perfect woman."

Leather-Stocking Tales. Five stories or romances written by James Fenimore Cooper. The same hero, Leather-Stocking, or Natty Bumppo, figures in all in his life among the Indians. Natty had learned wood-lore as the young Indian learned it. He knew the calls of the wild animals far across the wilderness. He could follow the deer and bear to their haunts. He could trace the path of the wolf by the broken cobwebs glistening in the sunlight; and the cry of the panther was a speech as familiar as his own tongue. When he was thirsty he made a cup of leaves, and drank in the Indian fashion. He lay down to rest with that sense of security that comes only to the forester. These tales take Leather-Stocking from young manhood to old age following the fortunes of the American Indian tribes. The order in which his story is told in these volumes is the "The Deerslayer," "The Last of the Mohicans," "The Pathfinder," "The Pioneers" and "The Prairie." He is also known by the name of Hawkeye in one part of his story. The best writers on the American Indian are thus quoted in our literatures: James F. Cooper, the romancer of the Indian; Henry W. Longfellow, the poet of the Indian; Francis Parkman, the historian of the Indian; Helen Hunt Jackson, the novelist of the Indian.

Legend. Anciently, a kind of rubric containing the prayers appointed to be read in Roman Catholic churches. In later times, the word was employed to denote a chronicle or register of the lives of saints, because they were to be read on the festivals of the saints. The way in which a credulous love of the wonderful, exaggeration of fancy, and ecclesiastical enthusiasm, at times even pious fraud, mixed themselves up in these narratives with true history, caused stories of a religious or ecclesiastical nature generally to be designated as "legends," to distinguish them from real history. The word has been much used in connection with the wild tales of ancient times, especially those known among the peasantry of Europe. Among the mediæval collections of legends, that drawn up by the Genoese archbishop, Jacobus de Voragine, in the second half of the Thirteenth Century, under the title of "Legenda Aurea" (the Golden Legends), or "Historia Lombardica," is the most celebrated.

Legion of Honor, The. An order conferred in recognition of military and civil merit, instituted by Napoleon I., while First Consul, May 19, 1802. It consists of different grades, as grand-crosses (of whom there are eighty), grand-officers (500), officers (4,000), and legionaries (whose number is not limited). The highest functionary is the "chancellor." The splendid edifice erected in Paris during the first empire, and known as the "Palace of the Legion of Honor," after having been partially destroyed during the Communist outbreak has been rebuilt.

Le'online Verses. These fancies were common in the Twelfth Century, and were so called from Leoninus, a canon of the Church of St. Victor, in Paris, the inventor. In English verse, any meter which rhymes middle and end is called a Leonine verse.

Le'the. A personification of oblivion often referred to in literature. The tradition is that the soul, at the death of the body, drank of the River Lethê that it might carry into the world of shadows no remembrance of earth and its concerns.

Letterpress. Printed matter. The word is often used to distinguish printed words from engraving.

Lexicon. A vocabulary, or book containing an alphabetical arrangement of the words of a language, with an explanation of the meaning or sense of each. The term is chiefly used with reference to dictionaries or word-books of the Greek and Hebrew languages.

Libations. With the prayers among all ancient peoples were usually joined the libations, or drink offerings. These consisted generally of wine, part of which was poured out in honor of the gods, and part of it drunk by the worshiper. The wine must be pure, and offered in a full cup. Sometimes there were libations of water, of honey, of milk, and of oil.

Light of the Harem. Name given to the bride of Selim in the poem Lalla Rookh. She was the Sultana Nour'mahal', afterwards called Nourjeham ("light of the world").

Ligeia. Written by Poe. Suggested by a dream in which the eyes of the heroine produced the wonderful effect described in the story. Its theme is the conquest of death through the power of will.

Liguo'rians. A congregation of missionary priests, called also Redemptorists, founded in 1732, by St. Alphonsus.

Lilli-Burle'ro. A song with the refrain of "Lilliburlo, bullen-a-lal!" was written by Lord Wharton, and contributed much to the great revolution of 1688. The whole army, and at last the people, both in city and country, sang it perpetually. The words are also said to have been used as a sort of war-cry during the persecution of the Protestants by the Irish Papists in 1641.

Lilliput. An imaginary country described in "Gulliver's Travels," where an ordinary man becomes a great giant beside the small people of the land. Lilliputian used to designate small ways of expressing malice or jealousy. Among amusing characters in Lilliput land were the Little-Endians and Big-Endians who made up two religious factions, which waged incessant war on the subject of the right interpretation of the fifty-fourth chapter of the "Blun'decral": "All true believers break their eggs at the convenient end." The godfather of Calin, the reigning Emperor of Lilliput, happened to cut his finger while breaking his egg at the big end, and therefore commanded all faithful Lilliputians to break their eggs in future at the small end. The Blefuscudians called this decree rank heresy, and determined to exterminate the believers of such an abominable practice from the face of the earth. Hundreds of treatises were published on both sides, but each empire put all those books opposed to its own views into the "Index Expurgatorius," and not a few of the more zealous sort died as martyrs for daring to follow their private judgment in the matter.

Limbo. A place where the souls of good men not admitted into heaven wait the general resurrection. A similar place exists for the souls of unbaptized children. Still another Limbo is a Fool's Paradise, a place for all nonsense. This old superstitious belief has been used by Dante and Milton in their poems.

Literati. Men of letters, scholars of note.

Lithgow's Bower. A favorite residence of the kings and queens of Scotland, especially of Mary of Guise; and here the unfortunate Mary Queen of Scots was born in 1542.

Little Brother. An appellation made popular through the tale bearing the name. Josiah Flynt ran away from home when he was three years old and had been doing it frequently ever after. His first piece of fiction was naturally based on trampdom. His hero is a boy-tramp, a little fellow whose irresistible impulse to view the great world around him causes him to become a "Prushun" to an old inhabitant of Hoboland. He wished people to see where a number of stray boys land, for he had found out that a great many of the so-called "kidnapped" youngsters are in reality simple runaways with romantic temperaments.

Little Citizens. Characters in a New York school teacher's stories of her East Side Jewish charges. Human nature and American Yiddish dialect are alike faithfully rendered.

Little Dorrit. The heroine and title of a novel by Dickens. Little Dorrit was born and brought up in the Marshalsea prison, where her father was confined for debt.

Little John. A big, stalwart fellow, named John Little, who encountered Robin Hood, and gave him a sound thrashing, after which he was rechristened, and Robin stood godfather. Little John is introduced by Sir Walter Scott in "The Talisman."

Little Masters. A name applied to certain designers belonging in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries. Called little because their designs were on a small scale, fit for copper or wood. The most famous are Jost Amman, for the minuteness of his work; Hans Burgmair, who made drawings in wood illustrative of the triumph of the Emperor Maximilian; Hans Sebald Beham; Albert Altdorfer, and Henrich Aldegraver. Albert Dürer and Lucas van Leyden brought the art into notice and it became popular.

Little Nell. Old Curiosity Shop, Dickens. The prominent character of the story, pure and true, though living in the midst of selfishness and crime. She was brought up by her grandfather, who was in his dotage, and who tried to eke out a narrow living by selling curiosities. At length, through terror of Quilp, the old man and his grandchild stole away, and led a vagrant life.

Llewel'lyn. A legendary Welsh prince who, on returning from hunting, found his baby boy missing and his favorite greyhound, Gelert, covered with blood. Thinking that the hound had eaten him, he killed it. But, on searching more carefully, the child was found alive under the cradle clothes, and near him the body of a huge wolf which had been killed by the faithful hound.

Lochiel. Is the title of the head of the clan Cameron.

Lochinvar'. A young Highlander, in the poem of Marmion, was much in love with a lady whose fate was decreed, that she should marry a "laggard." Young Lochinvar persuaded the too-willing lassie to be his partner in a dance; and while the guests were intent on their amusements, swung her into his saddle and made off with her before the bridegroom could recover from his amazement.

Locksley. So Robin Hood is sometimes called, from the village in which he was born.

Locksley Hall. A poem by Tennyson, in which the hero, the lord of Locksley Hall, having been jilted by his cousin Amy for a rich boor, pours forth his feelings in a flood of scorn and indignation. The poem is understood to have been occasioned by a similar incident in the poet's own life, but this has been questioned.

Locrin, or Locrine. Father of Sabri'na, and eldest son of the mythical Brutus, King of ancient Britain. On the death of his father he became King of Loe'gria.

Loegria or Lo'gres. England is so called by Geoffrey of Monmouth, from Logrine, eldest son of the mythical King Brute.

Logogriph. Among the French, a kind of riddle, which consists in some elision or mutilation of words; it may be defined as being between an enigma and a rebus.

Logos. This word, as occurring at the beginning of the gospel of St. John, was early taken to refer to the "second person of the Trinity, i. e., Christ." Yet the precise meaning of the Apostle, who alone makes use of the term in this manner, and only in the introductory part of his gospel; whether he adopted the symbolizing usage in which it was employed by the various schools of his day; which of their differing significations he had in view, or whether he intended to convey a meaning quite peculiar to himself;—these are some of the innumerable questions to which the word has given rise, and which, though most fiercely discussed ever since the first days of Christianity, are far from having found a satisfactory solution.

Lo'hen-grin. The Knight of the Swan: the hero of a romance by Wolfram von Eschenbach, a German minnesinger of the Thirteenth Century, and also of a modern music drama by Richard Wagner. He was the son of Parsival, and came to Brabant in a ship drawn by a white swan, which took him away again when his bride, disobeying his injunction, pressed him to discover his name and parentage.

Lord Linlithgow. A character growing into favor and while it does not prove that the end justifies the means, certainly suggests that the "means" may be excused if sufficiently prominent men sanction them. In his desire to serve his party, and incidentally himself, this Lord blackmails a man, but, when the party chief rewards the blackmailer by a seat in parliament, it seemed reasonable, that the Lord should once more hold up his head in society as one who had quite regained a possibly lost self-esteem. To the perplexed lady-love such a hope as this is offered: "If it is not easy to be quite good, it is impossible to be wholly bad." "Lord Linlithgow" has value in giving an up-to-date glimpse of political life in England. When an indignant moralist recently ventured to point out Mr. Cecil Rhodes's deficiencies, Mr. Kipling rejoined: "Why, man, but he is building an empire!" (Morley Roberts.)

Lotos-Eaters. Tennyson has a poem called "The Lotos-Eaters," a set of islanders who live in a dreamy idleness, weary of life, and regardless of all its stirring events.

Love Doctor, The. L'Amour Medecin. A comedy by Molière written about the year 1665. Lucinde, the daughter of Sganarelle, is in love, and the father calls in four doctors to consult upon the nature of her malady. They see the patient, and retire to consult together, but talk about Paris, about their visits, about the topics of the day; and when the father enters to know what opinion they have formed, they all prescribe different remedies, and pronounce different opinions. Lisette then calls in a "quack" doctor (Clitandre, the lover), who says that he must act on the imagination, and proposes a seeming marriage, to which Sganarelle assents. The assistant being a notary, Clitandre and Lucinde are married.

Love's Labor's Lost. Ferdinand, King of Navarre, with three lords named Biron, Dumain, and Longaville, agree to spend three years in study, during which time no woman was to approach the court. The compact signed all went well until the princess of France, attended by Rosaline, Maria, and Katharine, besought an interview respecting certain debts said to be due from the King of France to the King of Navarre. The four gentlemen fell in love with the four ladies. The love of the king sought the princess, by right, Biron loved Rosaline, Longaville admired Maria, and Dumain adored Katharine. In order to carry their suits, the four gentlemen, disguised as Muscovites, presented themselves before the ladies; but the ladies being warned of the masquerade, disguised themselves also, so that the gentlemen in every case addressed the wrong lady. A mutual arrangement was made that the suits should be deferred for twelve months and a day; and if, at the expiration of that time, they remained of the same mind, the matter should be taken into serious consideration. (Shakespeare.)

Loves of the Angels. A rhymed story written by Thomas Moore. It may be called the stories of three angels, and was founded on the Eastern tale of "Harût and Marût, and the rabbinical fictions of the loves of" "Uzziel and Shamchazai." (1) The first angel fell in love with Lea, whom he saw bathing. She returned love for love, but his love was carnal, hers heavenly. He loved the woman she loved the angel. At last the angel gave to her the pass-word which should open the gates of heaven. She pronounced it, and rose through the air into paradise. The angel degenerated and became no longer an angel of light, but "of the earth, earthy." (2) The second angel was Rubi, one of the seraphs. He loved Liris, who asked him to come in all his celestial glory. He did so; and she, rushing into his arms, was burnt to death; but the kiss she gave him became a brand on his face forever. (3) The third angel was Zaraph, who loved Nama. It was Nama's desire to love without control, and to love holily; but as she fixed her love on a creature, and not on the Creator, both she and Zaraph were doomed to live among the things that perish. When the end of all shall come, Nama and Zaraph will be admitted into the realms of everlasting love.

Lover's Vows. Altered from Kotzebue's. Baron Wildenhaim, in his youth, seduced Agatha Friburg, and then forsook her. She had a son Frederick, who became a soldier. While on furlough, he came to spend his time with his mother, and found her in abject poverty and almost starved. A poor cottager took her in, while Frederick, who had no money, went to beg charity. Count Wildenhaim was out with his gun, and Frederick asked alms of him. The count gave him a shilling; Frederick demanded more, and, being refused, seized the baron by the throat. The keepers arrived and put him in the castle dungeon. Here he was visited by the chaplain, and it came out that the count was his father. The chaplain being appealed to, told the count the only reparation he could make would be to marry Agatha and acknowledge the young soldier to be his son. This advice he followed, and Agatha Friburg, the beggar, became the baroness Wildenhaim of Wildenhaim Castle.

Loving Cup. A large cup passed round from guest to guest at state banquets and city feasts. On the introduction of Christianity, the custom of wassailing was not abolished, but it assumed a religious aspect. The monks called the wassail bowl the loving cup. In the universities the term "Grace Cup" is more general. Immediately after grace the silver cup, filled with wine, is passed round. The master and wardens drink welcome to their guests; the cup is then passed to all the guests. A loving or grace cup should have two handles, and some have four. This ceremony, of drinking from one cup and passing it round, was observed in the Jewish paschal supper, and our Lord refers to the custom in the words, "Drink ye all of it."

Lubberland. An imaginary country of idleness and luxury. The name has been applied to certain cities in burlesque.

Lugg-nagg. An imaginary island whose inhabitants have the gift of eternal life lacking with it the gift of immortal health and strength.

Lumbercourt, Lord. A voluptuary, greatly in debt, who consented, for a good money consideration, to give his daughter to Egerton McSycophant. Egerton, however, had no fancy for the lady, but married Constantia, the girl of his choice. His lordship was in alarm lest this should be his ruin; but Sir Pertinax told him the bargain should still remain good if Egerton's younger brother, Sandy, were accepted by his lordship instead. To this his lordship readily agreed.

Lumbercourt, Lady Rudolpha, daughter of Lord Lumbercourt, who, for a consideration, consented to marry Egerton McSycophant; but as Egerton had no fancy for the lady, she agreed to marry Egerton's brother Sandy on the same terms.

Lure of the Labrador Wild, The. A recital of the ill-fated expedition to Labrador undertaken by Leonidas Hubbard, Jr., during the summer of 1903. The party consisted of Mr. Hubbard, Mr. Wallace, and a half-breed Cree Indian named Elson, who proved himself a veritable hero. As is generally known, the object of the party was to reach the interior of Labrador over a portion of that country unexplored, or at least unmapped by white men. This purpose was only partially carried out. The winter came on long before Hubbard was ready to turn back, the provisions were exhausted, game was scarce, and the fish failed to rise to the fly. On the return journey toward the coast Hubbard gave out and had to be left behind until aid could be brought. Wallace succeeded in finding some provisions which had been thrown aside on the inland trip and had returned within a few hundred feet of Hubbard's tent, but without finding it. Elson, the half-breed, managed to reach a trapper's camp and sent back a relief expedition, which picked up Wallace, and later found the body of Hubbard, who had died of starvation.

Lusiad, The. The only Portuguese poem that has gained a world-wide celebrity. It was written by Luiz de Camoëns, appeared in 1572, and was entitled "Os Lusíadas," the "Lusitanians," i. e., the Portuguese — the subject being the conquests of that nation in India. It is divided into ten cantos, containing 1,102 stanzas. It has been translated into English, but it has never been popular out of Portugal. The Lusiad celebrates the chief events in the history of Portugal, and is remarkable as the only modern epic poem which is pervaded by anything approaching the national and popular spirit of ancient epic poems. Bacchus was the guardian power of the Mohammedans, and Venus or Divine Love of the Lusitanians. The fleet first sailed to Mozambique, then to Melinda (in Africa), where the adventurers were hospitably received and provided with a pilot to conduct them to India. In the Indian Ocean, Bacchus tried to destroy the fleet; Venus, however, calmed the sea, and Gama arrived at India in safety. Having accomplished his object, he returned to Lisbon. Among the most famous passages are the tragical story of Inez de Castro, and the apparition of the giant Adamastor, who appears as the Spirit of the Storm to Vasco de Gama, when crossing the Cape. The versification of "The Lusiad" is extremely charming. The best edition of "The Lusiad" was published in Paris (1817), reprinted in 1819, and again, in 1823. "The Lusiad" has been translated into Spanish, French, Italian, English, Polish, and German.

Lusitania. The ancient name of Portugal; so called from Lus, the companion of Bacchus in his travels. He colonized the country, and called it "Lusitania," and the colonists "Lusians."

Lustrum. The solemn offering made for expiation and purification by one of the censors in the name of the Roman people at the conclusion of the Census. The animals offered in sacrifice were a boar, sheep, and bull. They were led round the assembled people on the Campus Martius before being sacrificed. As the census was quinquennial, the word "lustrum" came to signify a period of five years.

Luther's Postil Gospels. Advent, Christmas, and Epiphany sermons, first published in Latin in 1521, and dedicated to his protector, the Elector Frederick. Translated immediately into German, Luther's postils, i. e., homilies, on the Gospels are esteemed the best of his sermons.

Lybius, Sir. A very young knight who undertook to rescue the lady of Sinadone. After many adventures with knights, giants, and enchanters, he entered the palace. Presently the whole edifice fell to pieces and a horrible serpent coiled round his neck. The spell being broken, the serpent turned into the lady of Sinadone herself, rejoicing in her rescue she wed the young knight. (Liblaux, a romance.)

Lycidas. The name under which Milton celebrates the untimely death of Edward King, who was drowned in the passage from Chester to Ireland, August 10, 1637. He was the son of Sir John King, secretary for Ireland.

Lydia. Daughter of the King of Lydia, was sought in marriage by Alcestes, a Tracian knight; his suit was refused, and he repaired to the King of Armenia, who gave him an army, with which he laid siege to Lydia.

He was persuaded by the king's daughter to raise the siege. The King of Armenia would not give up the project, and Alcestes slew him. Lydia now sets him all sorts of dangerous tasks to "prove his love," all of which he surmounted. Lastly, she induced him to kill all his allies, and when this was done she mocked him. Alcestes pined and died, and Lydia was doomed to endless torment in hell, where Astolpho saw her, to whom she told her story. (Orlando Furioso, bk. XVII.)

Lyd'i-a Lan'guish. The heroine of Sheridan's comedy of "The Rivals," distinguished for the extravagance of her romantic notions.

Lyre. The name of the earliest known of all stringed instruments of music, invented, according to Egyptian tradition, by the god Mercury, and regarded among poets, painters, and statuaries as an emblem of Apollo and the Muses. It is supposed to have had, originally, only three strings; afterwards it had eleven. The lyre of Terpander and Olympus had only three strings; the Scythian lyre had five; that of Simonides had eight. It was played with a plectrum, or stick of ivory or polished wood, and sometimes with the fingers. It is said to have been primarily constructed of tortoise-shell. Amphion built Thebes with the music of his lyre. The very stones moved of their own accord into walls and houses. Ari'on charmed the dolphins by the music of his lyre, and when the bard was thrown overboard one of them carried him safely to Tæ'narus. Hercules was taught music by Linus. One day, being reproved, the strong man broke the head of his master with his own lyre. Orpheus charmed savage beasts, and even the infernal gods, with the music of his lyre.

Lyric. Literally, pertaining to the lyre. In poetry a name originally applied to what was sung or recited with an accompaniment to the lyre, but it is now applied to odes, ballads, and other verses, such as may be set to music. Lyrics were originally employed in celebrating the praises of gods and heroes, and its characteristic was melodiousness. The Greeks cultivated it with effect, particularly Anacreon and Sappho, but among the Romans, Horace was the first and principal lyric poet. It has been said that all poets are singers and these singers are divided into three classes. First, the lyric poet, who can sing but one tune with his one voice. Second, the epic poet, who with his one voice can sing several tunes. Third, the true dramatist, who has many tongues and can sing all tunes.

Mab, Queen. Romeo and Juliet, Shakespere. The origin of the name is obscure. By some it is derived from the Midgard of the Eddas. The name is given by the English poets of the Fifteenth and succeeding centuries to the imaginary queen of the fairies.

Mabinogion. A series of Welsh tales, chiefly relating to Arthur and the Round Table. A MS. volume of some 700 pages is preserved in the library of Jesus College, Oxford.

Macbeth. The tale of Macbeth and Banquo was borrowed from the legendary history of Scotland, but the interest of the play is not historical. It is a tragedy of human life, intensely real, the soul, with all its powers for good or evil, deliberately choosing evil. The three witches in the desert place, in thunder, lightning, storm, strike the keynote of evil suggestion. The awfulness of soul destruction is felt in Macbeth and Lady Macbeth as in no other of Shakespere's dramas.

Mac-heath', Captain. A highwayman who is the hero of Gay's "Beggars' Opera."

Machiavel'ism. The name came from a writing by Machiavelli, under the title "De Principatibus" (the Prince), a famous treatise, written probably to gratify the Medici, and in which are expounded those principles of political cunning and artifice, intended to promote arbitrary power, ever since designated "machiavelism."

Mac-I'vor. Waverley, Scott. Fergus Mac-Ivor is a prominent character in the novel, and his sister, Flora Mac-Ivor, the heroine. They are of the family of a Scottish chieftain.

Mac'reons, The Island of. Pantag'ruel, Rabelais. The title is given to Great Britain, derived from a Greek word, meaning long-lived, "because no one is put to death there for his religious opinions." Rabelais says the island "is full of antique ruins and relics of popery and ancient superstitions."

McFin'gal. The hero of Trumbull's political poem of the same name; represented as a burly New England squire, enlisted on the side of the Tory party of the American Revolution, and constantly engaged in controversy with Honorius, the champion of the Whigs.

Madasi'ma, Queen. An important character in the old romance called "Am'adis de Gaul"; her constant attendant was Elis'abat, a famous surgeon, with whom she roamed in solitary retreats.

Madge Wildfire. The insane daughter of old Meg Murdochson, the gipsy thief. Madge was a beautiful but giddy girl, whose brain was crazed by her own downfall and the murder of her infant.

Madoc. A poem by Southey; is founded on one of the legends connected with the early history of America. Madoc, a Welsh prince of the Twelfth Century, is represented as making the discovery of the Western world. His contests with the Mexicans form the subject.

Madrigal. Is a short lyric poem, generally on the subject of love, and characterized by some epigrammatic terseness or quaintness, and composed of a number of free and unequal verses, confined neither to the regularity of the sonnet, nor to the subtlety of the epigram. The madrigals of Tasso are noted in Italian poetry.

Magi. The three "Wise Men" who followed the star to Bethlehem. The traditional names of the three Magi are Melchior, represented as an old man with a long beard, offering gold; Jasper, a beardless youth who offers frankincense; Balthazar, a black, or Moor, who tenders myrrh.

Magic Rings. These are mentioned by Plato, Cicero, and other writers and supposed to make the wearer invisible.

Magic Staff. The story of the magic staff belongs to the days of legends and seems to be of French origin, but has found its way into other lands. This staff would guarantee the bearer from all the perils and mishaps incidental to travelers. According to earliest traditions the staff was a willow branch cut on the eve of All Saints' Day.

Magic Wands. These are found in many old tales or writings. In Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered" the hermit gave to Charles the Dane and Ubaldo a wand, which, being shaken, infused terror into all who saw it, and in Spenser's Faëry Queen the palmer who accompanied Sir Guyon had a wand of like virtue. It was made of the same wood as Mercury's caduceus.

Magna'lia. The best-known in the long list of Cotton Mather's works was his "Magnalia Christi Americana," purporting to be an ecclesiastical history of New England, from its first planting in 1620 to the year 1698, but including also civil history, an account of Harvard College, of the Indian Wars, and the witchcraft troubles, and a large number of biographies.

Magna'no. Hudibras, Butler. One of the leaders of the rabble that attacked Hudibras at a bear-baiting.

Magnificat. In the ritual of the Roman Catholic Church, the name given to the "Song of the Virgin Mary," derived from the opening invocation in the Latin Vulgate.

Maidens' Castle. An allegorical castle mentioned in Malory's "History of Prince Arthur." It was taken from a duke by seven knights, and held by them till Sir Galahad expelled them. It was called "The Maidens' Castle," because these knights made a vow that every maiden who passed it should be made a captive.

Maid Marian. A half mythical character, but the name is said to have been assumed by Matilda, daughter of Robert Lord Fitzwalter, while Robin Hood remained in a state of outlawry. The name is considered the foundation of the word marionettes, from Maid Marian's connection with the Morris dance, or May-day dance, at which she was said to appear.

Maid of Athens. Made famous by Lord Byron's song of this title. Twenty-four years after this song was written, an Englishman sought out "the Athenian maid," and found a beggar without a vestige of beauty.

Maid of Saragossa. Childe Harold, Byron. A young Spanish woman distinguished for her heroism during the defense of Saragossa in 1808-09. She first attracted notice by mounting a battery where her lover had fallen, and working a gun in his room.

Mal'aprop, Mrs. A character in Sheridan's "Rivals," noted for her blundering use of words.

Mal-bec'co. "Faery Queen," Spenser. The husband of a young wife, Helinore, and himself a crabbed, jealous old fellow.

Malen'grin. A character in Spenser's "Faery Queen," who carried a net on his back "to catch fools with." The name has grown to mean the personification of guile or flattery.

Malepar'dus. The castle of Master Reynard the Fox, in the beast epic of "Reynard the Fox."

Malvoi'sin. Ivanhoe, Scott. One of the challenging knights at the tournament (Sir Philip de Malvoisin). Sir Albert de Malvoisin was a preceptor of the Knights Templar.

Mambri'no. Poems, Ariosto, etc. A king of the Moors, who was the possessor of an enchanted golden helmet, which rendered the wearer invulnerable, and which was the object of eager quest to the Paladins of Charlemagne. This helmet was borne away by the knight Rinaldo. In "Don Quixote" we are told of a barber who was caught in a shower of rain, and who, to protect his hat, clapped his brazen basin on his head. Don Quixote insisted that this basin was the helmet of the Moorish king: and, taking possession of it, wore it as such.

Man'agarm. Prose Edda. The largest and most formidable of the race of giants. He dwells in the Ironwood, Jarnvid. Managarm will first fill himself with the blood of man, and then will he swallow up the moon. This giant symbolizes war, and the "Iron wood" in which he dwells is the wood of spears.

Manfred. Subject of a poem by Byron, written under this title. Manfred sold himself to the prince of darkness, and received from him seven spirits to do his bidding. They were the spirits of "earth, ocean, air, night, mountains, winds, and the star of his own destiny." Wholly without human sympathies, the count dwelt in splendid solitude among the Alpine Mountains. He loved Astarte, and was visited by her spirit after her death. In spirit form she told Manfred that he would die the following day: and when asked if she loved him, she sighed "Manfred," and vanished.

Mantali'ni. Nicholas Nickleby, Dickens. The husband of madame; he is a man-doll, noted for his white teeth, his oaths, and his gorgeous morning gown. This "exquisite" lives on his wife's earnings, and thinks he confers a favor on her by spending. Madame Mantalini is represented as a fashionable milliner near Cavendish Square, London.

Marcel'lus. Hamlet, Shakespere. An officer of Denmark, to whom the ghost of the murdered king appeared before it presented itself to Prince Hamlet.

Marchioness, The. Old Curiosity Shop, Dickens. A half-starved maid of-all-work, in the service of Sampson Brass and his sister Sally. She was so lonesome and dull, that it afforded her relief to peep at Mr. Swiveller even through the keyhole of his door. Mr. Swiveller called her the "marchioness," when she played cards with him, "because it seemed more real and pleasant" to play with a marchioness than with a domestic. While enjoying these games they made the well-known "orange-peel wine."

Mariana in the Moated Grange. In Tennyson's poem by this name, a young damsel who sits in the moated grange, looking out for her lover, who never comes. (2) In Shakespere's "Measure for Measure" Mariana is a lovely and lovable lady, betrothed to Angelo, who, during the absence of Vincentio, the Duke of Vienna, acted as his lord deputy. Her pleadings to the duke for Angelo are wholly unrivaled.

Marplot. "The busy body." A blundering, good-natured, meddlesome young man, very inquisitive, too officious by half, and always bungling whatever he interferes in. Character found in comedies written by Mrs. Centlivre.

Martin's Summer, St. Halcyon days: a time of prosperity: fine weather. Mentioned by Shakespere in Henry VI., etc.

Masora. A critical work or canon, whereby is fixed and ascertained the reading of the text of the Hebrew version of the Bible.

Masques. Dramatic representations made for a festive occasion, with a reference to the persons present and the occasion. Their personages were allegorical. They admitted of dialogue, music, singing, and dancing, combined by the use of some ingenious fable into a whole. They were made and performed for the court and the houses of the nobles, and the scenery was gorgeous and varied. According to Holinshed's Chronicle, the first masque performed in England was at Greenwich, in 1512. Shakespere, as well as Beaumont and Fletcher, have frequently introduced masques into their plays. Milton himself made them worthier by writing "Comus." H. W. Longfellow wrote the "Masque of Pandora," taking the story from Hawthorne's "Wonder Book."

Mauth Dog. Lay of the Last Minstrel, Scott. A black specter spaniel that haunted the guard-room of Peeltown in the Isle of Man. A drunken trooper entered the guard-room while the dog was there, but lost his speech, and died within three days.

Mavournin. Irish for "darling."

May'eux. The name of a hunchback, who figures prominently in numberless French caricatures and romances.

Mazep'pa. Poem, Byron. Mazeppa in poem under same title was a Cossack of noble family who became a page in the court of the King of Poland, and while in this capacity intrigued with Theresia, the young wife of a count, who discovered the amour, and had the young page lashed to a wild horse, and turned adrift.

Measure for Measure. Shakespere. There was a law in Vienna that made it death for a man to live with a woman not his wife; but the law was so little enforced that the mothers of Vienna complained to the duke of its neglect. So the duke deputed Angelo to enforce it: and, assuming the dress of a friar, absented himself awhile, to watch the result. Scarcely was the duke gone, when Claudio was sentenced to death for violating the law. His sister Isabel went to intercede on his behalf, and Angelo told her he would spare her brother if she would become his Phrynê. Isabel told her brother he must prepare to die, as the conditions proposed by Angelo were out of the question. The duke, disguised as a friar, heard the whole story, and persuaded Isabel to "assent in words," but to send Mariana (the divorced wife of Angelo) to take her place. This was done: but Angelo sent the provost to behead Claudio, a crime which "the friar" contrived to avert. Next day, the duke returned to the city, and Isabel told her tale. The end was, the duke married Isabel, Angelo took back his wife, and Claudio married Juliet.

Meeting of the Waters. Title of a poem by Moore, better known under the name "Sweet Vale of Avoca." "The Meeting of the Waters" forms a part of that beautiful scenery which lies between Rathdrum and Arklow, in the county of Wicklow, Ireland: and these lines were suggested by a visit to this romantic spot in the summer of 1807.

Meg Mer'illies. A prominent character in Scott's "Guy Mannering," a half-crazy gypsy or sibyl.

Meis'tersingers. In Germany an association of master tradesmen, to revive the national minstrelsy, which had fallen into decay with the decline of the minnesingers or love-minstrels (1350-1523). Their subjects were chiefly moral or religious, and constructed according to rigid rules.

Meis'ter, Wilhelm. Hero and title of a philosophic novel by Goethe. The object is to show that man, despite his errors and shortcomings, is led by a guiding hand, and reaches some higher aim at last. This is considered to be the first true German novel.

Melis'sa. Orlando Furioso, Ariosto. The prophetess who lived in Merlin's cave. Brad'amant gave her the enchanted ring to take to Roge'ro: so, assuming the form of Atlantes, she not only delivered Roge'ro, but disenchanting all the forms metamorphosed in the island, where he was captive.

Mel'notte, Claude. Lady of Lyons, Bulwer. The son of a gardener in love with Pauline, "the Beauty of Lyons," but treated by her with contempt. Beauseant and Glavis, two other rejected suitors, conspired with him to humble her.

Melyhalt. A powerful female subject of King Arthur's court. Sir Galiot invaded her domain, but she forgave his trespass and chose him for her knight and chevalier.

Menard. The Road to Frontenac, Merwin. The hero of the novel, a leader among Indians and white men during the making of New France. From Quebec he goes west, holding control of affairs in spite of treachery in both races. His companions are chiefly French, amid whom figure a Jesuit and two Indians, and the story contains much of that romantic charm peculiar to early French pioneer life, whence Longfellow and other poets and story-tellers have drawn inspiration.

Mengtse. The fourth of the sacred books of China, so called from its author, Mengtse, Latinized into Mencius. This great work was written in the Fourth Century B. C., and contains the wisdom of the age. These are some of its teachings: "Humanity, righteousness, propriety, knowledge, are as natural to man as his four limbs." "Humanity is internal, righteousness is external." In this same book Mencius taught that government is from God, but for the people whose welfare is the supreme good. The phrase "mother of Meng," which has been borrowed from the Chinese, signifies "a great teacher."

Menteur', Le (Fr. The Liar). Comedy by Corneille. The propensities of the leading character give the play its name and lead to the complications of the plot. This is generally considered Corneille's best comedy and the most important before the time of Molière.

Merchant's Tale, The. Chaucer. Is substantially the same as the first Latin metrical tale of Adolphus, and is not unlike a Latin prose tale given in the appendix of Wright's edition of Æsop's Fables. It is the story of the betrayal of an old husband by a young wife. The story is evidently of Oriental origin and very old. Boccaccio and Chaucer may have borrowed it from the "Commedia Lydiæ." The well-known incident of the pear tree is found in all these sources. An interesting account of these sources has been given by the Chaucer Society Publications under "Origins and Analogues of the Tales." Pope used this story as his basis for "January and May."

Merchant of Venice. Antonio, the merchant, in Shakespeare's play, signs a bond in order to borrow money from Shylock, a Jew, for Bassano, the lover of Portia. If the loan was repaid within three months, only the principal would be required: if not, the Jew should be at liberty to claim a pound of flesh from Antonio's body. The ships of Antonio being delayed by contrary winds, the merchant was unable to meet his bill, and the Jew claimed the forfeiture. Portia, in the dress of a law doctor, conducted the defense, and saved Antonio by reminding the Jew that a pound of flesh gave him no drop of blood.

Merlin. The name of an ancient Welsh prophet and enchanter. He is often alluded to by the older poets, especially Spenser, in his "Faëry Queen," and also figures in Tennyson's "Idylls of the King." In the "History of Prince Arthur" by Malory, Merlin is the prince of enchanters and of a supernatural origin. He is said to have built the Round Table and to have brought from Ireland the stones of Stonehenge on Salisbury Plain.

Merlin's Cave. In Dynevor, near Carmarthen, noted for its ghastly noises of rattling iron chains, groans, and strokes of hammers. The cause is this: Merlin set his spirits to fabricate a brazen wall to encompass the city of Carmarthen, and, as he had to call on the Lady of the Lake, bade them not slacken their labor till he returned; but he never did return, for Vivian held him prisoner by her wiles.

Messiah, The. An epic poem in fifteen books, by F. G. Klopstock. The subject is the last days of Jesus, His crucifixion and resurrection.

Midsummer Night's Dream. Egeus promised his daughter, Hermia, to Demetrius. She loved Lysander and fled from Athens with her lover. Demetrius went in pursuit of her, followed by Helena, who doted on him. All four came to a forest and fell asleep. Oberon and Titania had quarreled, and Oberon, by way of punishment, dropped on Titania's eyes during sleep some love-juice, or "Love in Idleness," the effect of which is to make the sleeper fall in love with the first thing seen when waking. The first thing seen by Titania was Bottom the weaver, wearing an ass's head. In the meantime King Oberon dispatched Puck to the lovers and with the juice Puck changed their vision and made all content. It has been suggested that in this play Shakespeare may have borrowed hints from Chaucer. "The Tempest" and "Midsummer Night's Dream" are called Shakespeare's fairy plays.

Miliden' do. Gulliver's Travels, Swift. The metropolis of Lilliput, the wall of which was two feet and a half in height, and at least eleven inches thick. The emperor's palace, called Belfab'orac, was in the center of the city.

Miles Standish. In "Courtship of Miles Standish," a poem by H. W. Longfellow. From this poem the robust figures of the Puritan captain, in his haps and mishaps, and of John Alden and Priscilla, are now part of our national treasures.

Miller, Daisy. Name of heroine and title of the story by Henry James. An American girl traveling in Europe, where her innocence, ignorance, and disregard of European customs and standards of propriety, put her in compromising situations and frequently expose her conduct to misconstruction.

Minneha'ha. Hiawatha, H. W. Longfellow. The daughter of the arrow-maker of Daco'tah, and wife of Hiawatha. She was called Minnehaha from the waterfall of that name.

Minnesangers, or Minnesingers. A name given to the German lyric poets of the Middle Ages, on account of love being the principal theme of their lays, the German word "minne" being used to denote a pure and faithful love.

Miracle Plays. See "Mysteries."

Miranda. The Tempest, Shakespeare. The daughter of Prospero the exiled Duke of Milan, and niece of Antonio, the usurping duke. She is brought up on a desert island, with Ariel, the fairy spirit, and Cal'iban, the monster, as her only companions.

Mir'i-am. A beautiful and mysterious woman in Hawthorne's romance "The Marble Faun," for love of whom Donatello commits murder, thus becoming her partner in crime.

Miserere. A title given in the Roman Catholic Church to the fifty-first Psalm, usually called the "psalm of mercy."

Morality, The. An old play in which the characters were the Vices and Virtues, with the addition afterwards of allegorical personages, such as Riches, Good Deeds, Confession, Death, and any human condition or quality needed for the play. These characters were brought together in a rough story, at the end of which Virtue triumphed.

Morris Dance. Or the Moorish dance, was introduced into England in the reign of Edward III. It was a prominent feature of the May Day and other outdoor festivities.

Morituri Salutamis. A "hymn to age," written by H. W. Longfellow, for the jubilee reunion of Bowdoin's Class of 1825. It contains a number of classic allusions, and an entire tale from the "Gesta Romanorum."

Mortality, Old. Old Mortality, Scott. A religious itinerant, who frequented country churchyards and the graves of the covenanters. He was first discovered at Gandercleugh, clearing the moss from the grey tombstones, renewing with his chisel the half-defaced inscriptions, and repairing the decorations of the tombs.

Mu'alox. The Fair God, Lew Wallace. The old paba or prophet who assured Nenetzin that she was to be the future queen in her father's palace.

Muck'lebucket. The Antiquary, Scott. Name of a conspicuous family, consisting of Saunders Mucklebucket, the old fisherman of Musselcrag; Old Elspeth, mother of Saunders; Maggie, wife of Saunders; Steenie, the eldest son, who was drowned; Little Jennie, Saunders' child.

Munchau'sen, The Baron. A hero of most marvelous adventures, and the fictitious author of a book of travels filled with most extravagant tales. The name is said to refer to Hieronymus Karl Friedrich von Münchhausen, a German officer in the Russian Army, noted for his marvelous stories.

Mussel Slough Affair. Octopus, Norris. The basis of plot for the novel and name given to an actual piece of history almost unknown in the East when the wheat-growers of the San Joaquin Valley came into conflict with the railroad which they believed was trying to defraud them of their land.

Mysteries and Miracle-plays. Were dramas founded on the historical parts of the Old and New Testaments, and the lives of the saints, performed during the Middle Ages, first in churches, and afterwards in the streets on fixed or movable stages. The mystery was a representation of any portion of the New Testament history concerned with a mysterious subject, such as the Incarnation, the Atonement, or the Resurrection. Miracles and mysteries were popular in France, Germany, Spain, Italy, and England. The fathers of the Reformation showed no unfriendly feeling towards them. Luther is reported to have said that they often did more good and produced more impression than sermons. In the alpine districts of Germany, miracle-plays were composed and acted by the peasants. They at last began to partake to a limited extent of the burlesque, which had brought miracle-plays into disrepute elsewhere. In England, the greatest check they received was from the rise of the secular drama. The first miracle-plays were an expedient employed by the clergy for giving religious instruction to the people, and for extending and strengthening the influence of the Church. The earliest "Miracle" on record is the "Play of St. Catherine," which was written about 1119, in French, and was a rude picture of the miracles and martyrdom of that saint. Some of the titles of these old plays are the "Creation of the World," the "Fall of Man," the story of "Cain and Abel," the "Crucifixion of Our Lord," the "Massacre of the Innocents," "The Play of the Blessed Sacrament," the "Deluge." They were generally written in mixed prose and verse. It was necessary to introduce some comic enlivenment, and this was done by representing the wicked personages of the drama as placed in ludicrous situations. The devil generally played the part of the clown or jester.

Na'la. A legendary King of India, whose love for Damayanti and subsequent misfortunes have supplied subjects for numerous poems.

Natty Bumppo. Called "Leather-stockings." He appears in five of Cooper's novels: (1) "The Deerslayer"; (2) "The Pathfinder"; (3) "The Hawkeye," in "The Last of the Mohicans"; (4) "Natty Bumppo," in "The Pioneers"; and (5) as "The Trapper," in "The Prairie," in which he dies.

Neæ'ra. The name of a girl mentioned by the Latin poets, Horace, Virgil, and Tibullus; sometimes also introduced into modern pastoral poetry as the name of a mistress or sweetheart.

Nepen'the. A care-dispelling drug, which Polydamna, wife of Tho'nis, King of Egypt, gave to Helen. A drink containing this drug "changed grief to mirth, melancholy to joyfulness, and hatred to love." The water of Ardenne had the opposite effects. Homer mentions this drug nepenthê in his "Odyssey." It is also mentioned in Poe's "Raven."

Nest of Linnets. Title given to a story by F. F. Moore, a sequel to his "Jessamy Bride," and noted for the group of people collected. Richard Brinsley Sheridan may be called its hero, inasmuch as he is the lover of its heroine, Miss Linley, the famous singer, who became Sheridan's first wife. The whole remarkable family to which she belonged give title to the book. Garrick Goldsmith, Sir Joshua, Mrs. Thrale, Dr. Johnson, Thomas Sheridan, elocutionist and lexicographer, and father of Richard, Burke, and others.

Nestor. The name dates to ancient Grecian legend. Homer makes him the great counselor of the Grecian chiefs, and extols his eloquence as superior even to that of Ulysses. His authority was even considered equal to that of the immortal gods. Hence the name is often found in literature as an appellation denoting wisdom. Bryant has been called "The Nestor of Our Poets."

New Atlantis, The. An imaginary island in the middle of the Atlantic. Bacon, in his allegorical fiction so called, supposes himself wrecked on this island, where he finds an association for the cultivation of natural science and the promotion of arts. Called the "New" Atlantis to distinguish it from Plato's Atlantis, an imaginary island of fabulous charms.

Newcome, Colonel. A gallant, simple-hearted gentleman, a retired East Indian officer, in Thackeray's novel "The Newcomes." His unworldliness leads to the loss of his fortune, and he finally dies, poor and broken-hearted, in the Charter House hospital.

New England Primer. A book quoted as specimen of literature for children in early American days. A copy of the New England Primer, published in Walpole, N. H., in 1814, contains an illustrated alphabet. The letter "L" is illustrated by a lion with one of its paws resting upon a lamb which is lying down, and the following lines:

"The Lion bold
The Lamb doth hold."

New England Tragedies. Among the poems of H. W. Longfellow are the "New England Tragedies," and the "Divine Tragedy." These, it is said, are to be taken in connection with "The Golden Legend," the whole forming one connected work of art, somewhat as do the successive Arthurian legends of Tennyson.

New Jerusalem. The name by which in the Christian faith, heaven, or the abode of the redeemed, is symbolized. The allusion is to the description in the twenty-first chapter of the Book of Revelation.

New Pastoral. A poem by T. B. Read, truly American in character like its companion poem, "The Waggoner of the Alleghanies." The "New Pastoral" consists of a series of sketches of rustic and domestic life, mostly of primitive simplicity, and so truthful as to be not less valuable as history than attractive as poetry.

Nibelung, King. A king of the Nibelungen, a mythical Burgundian tribe, who gives name to the great mediæval epic of Germany, the "Nibelungen Lied." He bequeathed to his two sons a hoard or treasure beyond all price and incapable of diminution, which was won by Siegfried, who made war upon the Nibelungen and conquered them.

Nibelungen Lied. A historic poem generally called the German "Iliad." It is the only great national epic that European writers have produced since antiquity, and belongs to every country that has been peopled by Germanic tribes, as it includes the hero traditions of the Franks, the Burgundians and the Goths, with memorials of the ancient myths carried with them from Asia. The poem is divided into two parts, and thirty-two lieds or cantos. The first part ends with the death of Siegfried, and the second part with the death of Kriemhild. The death of Siegfried and the revenge of Kriemhild have been celebrated in popular songs dating back to the lyric chants now a thousand years old. These are the foundation of the great poem.

Nick'leby, Mrs. Nicholas Nickleby, Dickens. The mother of the hero, Nicholas, a widow fond of talking and of telling long stories with no connection. She imagined her neighbor, a mildly insane man, was in love with her because he tossed cabbages and other articles over the garden wall. She had a habit of introducing, in conversation, topics wholly irrelevant to the subject under consideration, and of always declaring, when anything unanticipated occurred, that she had expected it all along, and had prophesied to that precise effect on divers (unknown) occasions. Nicholas Nickleby has to make his own way in the world. He first goes as usher to Mr. Squeers, schoolmaster at Dotheboys Hall; but leaves in disgust with the tyranny of Squeers and his wife, especially to a poor boy named Smike. Smike runs away from the school to follow Nicholas, and remains his humble follower till death. At Portsmouth, Nicholas joins the theatrical company of Mr. Crummles, but leaves the profession for other adventures. He falls in with the brothers Cherryble, who make him their clerk; and in this post he rises to become a merchant, and ultimately marries Madeline Bray.

Nicknames by States. Names given to the inhabitants of the different States by popular use: Alabama, lizards; Arkan'sas, tooth-picks; Californ'ia, gold-hunters; Colora'do, rovers; Connec'ticut, wooden nutmegs; Del'aware, musk-rats; Flor'ida, fly-up-the-creeks; Geor'gia, buzzards; Illinois, suckers; Indiana, hoosiers; Iowa, hawk-eyes; Kansas, jay-hawkers; Kentucky, corn-crackers; Louisiana, creoles; Maine, foxes; Maryland, craw-thumpers; Mich'igan, wolverines; Minnesot'a, gophers; Mississip'pi, tadpoles; Missou'ri, pukes; Nebras'ka, bug-eaters; Neva'da, sage-hens; New Hampshire, granite boys; New Jersey, blues or clam-catchers; New York, knickerbockers; North Caroli'na, tar-boilers and tuckoes; Ohio, buck-eyes; Or'egon, web-feet and hard-cases; Pennsylv'nia, Pennanites and leather-heads; Rhode Island, gun-flints; South Caroli'na, weasels; Tennessee', whelps; Texas, beef-heads; Vermont, Green Mountain boys; Virgin'ia, beadies; Wisconsin, badgers.

Nine Worthies, The. Famous personages often alluded to, and classed together, rather in an arbitrary manner, like the Seven Wonders of the World, the Seven Wise Men of Greece, etc. They have been counted up in the following manner:

- | | |
|-------------------|-----------------------------------|
| Three Gentiles. | { 1. Hector, son of Priam. |
| | { 2. Alexander the Great. |
| | { 3. Julius Cæsar. |
| Three Jews. | { 4. Joshua, Conqueror of Canaan. |
| | { 5. David, King of Israel. |
| | { 6. Judas Maccabæus. |
| Three Christians. | { 7. Arthur, King of Britain. |
| | { 8. Charlemagne. |
| | { 9. Godfrey of Bouillon. |

Noctes Ambrosia'næ. A series of convivial fable talk, full of humor, although local in subject. They hold a high place in genial or recreative literature. They were mostly written by "Christopher North," the real John Wilson, and it is said that while Lockhart was writing "Vale'rius," he was in the habit of taking walks with Professor Wilson every morning, and of supping with Blackwood at Ambrose's, a small tavern in Edinburgh. One night Lockhart said, "What a pity there has not been a short-hand writer here to take down all the good things that have been said"! and next day he produced a paper from memory, and called it "Noctes Ambrosianæ." That was the first of the series.

North Americans of Yesterday. Name given to the Indians of North America by recent writers, among them F. S. Dellenbaugh in a work under same title. This work, a comparative study of North American Indian life and customs, is written on the theory that the races are of ethnic unity.

Nourmahal'. Lalla Rookh, Moore. "Light of the Haram." She was for a season estranged from the sultan, till he gave a grand banquet, at which she appeared in disguise as a lute-player and singer. The sultan was so enchanted with her performance, that he exclaimed, "If Nourmahal had so played and sung, I could forgive her all"; whereupon the sultana threw off her mask.

Novum Organum. The noted work of Roger Bacon, showing his system of philosophy. It was published in the year 1620.

Nuc'ta. Paradise and the Peri, Moore. The name given to the miraculous drop which falls from heaven, in Egypt, on St. John's Day, and is supposed to stop the plague.

Nun of Nidaros. Tales of a Wayside Inn, Longfellow. The abbess of the Drontheim convent, who heard the voice of St. John while she was kneeling at her midnight devotions.

Nut-Brown Maid. Reliques, Percy. The maid who was wooed by the "banished man." The "banished man" describes to her the hardships she would have to undergo if she married him; but finding that she accounted these hardships as nothing compared with his love, he revealed himself to be an earl's son, with large hereditary estates in Westmoreland, and married her.

O'bermann. The impersonation of high moral worth without talent, and the tortures endured by the consciousness of this defect. This name was given to the hero and imaginary author of a work of the same name by Etienne Pivert de Senancourt, a French writer.

O'beron. King of the Fairies, whose wife was Titania. Shakespere introduces both Oberon and Titania in his "Midsummer Night's Dream." He and Titania, his queen, are fabled to have lived in India, and to have crossed the seas to Northern Europe to dance by the light of the moon.

O'beron the Fay. A humpty dwarf only three feet high, but of angelic face, lord and king of Mommur.

Odyssey. Homer's epic, recording the adventures of Odysseus ("Ulysses") in his voyage home from Troy. The poem opens in the island of Calypso, with a complaint against Neptune and Calypso for preventing the return of Odysseus to Ithaca. Telemachos, the son of Odysseus, starts in search of his father, accompanied by Pallas in the guise of Mentor. He goes to Pylos, to consult old Nestor, and is sent by him to Sparta; where he is told by Menelaus that Odysseus is detained in the island of Calypso. In the meantime, Odysseus leaves the island, and, being shipwrecked, is cast on the shore of Phæacia. After twenty years' absence Odysseus returns to his home. Penelopë is tormented by suitors. To excuse herself, Penelopë tells her suitors he only shall be her husband who can bend Odysseus's bow. None can do so but the stranger, who bends it with ease. Odysseus is recognized by his wife, and the false suitors are all slain and peace is restored to Ithaca.

Offertory. In the Roman Catholic Church a form of words, in the first part of the Mass, by which the priest offers the elements previously to their consecration. In the English communion service, the sentences read by the officiating clergyman, while the people are making their offerings.

O'gier the Dane. One of the paladins of the Charlemagne epoch. Also made the hero of an ancient French romance, and the subject of a ballad, whose story is probably a contribution from the stores of Norman tradition, Holger, or Olger Danske, being the national hero of Denmark. He figures in Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso."

O'Groat'. A name often alluded to in early English parables or sayings coming from the legend of "John O'Groat's House." This ancient building was supposed to stand on the most northerly point in Great Britain. John of Groat and his brothers were originally from Holland. According to tradition, the house was of an octagonal shape, being one room with eight windows and eight doors, to admit eight members of the family, the heads of eight different branches of it, to prevent their quarrels for precedence at table, which, on a previous occasion, had well-nigh proved fatal.

Oldbuck, Jonathan. Antiquary, Scott. The character whose whimsies gave name to the novel. He is represented as devoted to the study and accumulation of old coins, medals, and relics. He is irritable, sarcastic, and cynical from an early disappointment in love, but full of humor and a faithful friend.

Old Man of the Sea. In the "Arabian Nights," a monster encountered by Sindbad the sailor in his fifth voyage. After carrying him upon his shoulders a long time, Sindbad at last succeeds in intoxicating him, and effects his escape. The "Old Man of the Sea" was also made the title of a humorous and well-known poem by O. W. Holmes.

Old Red Sandstone. One of the most noted of Hugh Miller's famous writings on geological subjects. It revealed his discovery of fossils in a formation which, up to that time, had been deemed almost destitute of them.

Oliver. As You Like It, Shakespere. Son and heir of Sir Rowland de Bois, who hated his youngest brother, Orlando, and whom he planned to murder by indirect methods. Orlando, finding it impossible to live in his brother's house, fled to the forest of Arden, where he joined the society of the banished duke. Oliver pursued him, and as he slept in the forest, a snake and a lioness lurked near to make him their prey. Orlando chanced to be passing, slew the two monsters and then found that the sleeper was his brother Oliver. Oliver's feelings underwent a change, and he loved his brother as much as he had before hated him. In the forest, the two brothers met Rosalind and Celia. The former, who was the daughter of the banished duke, married Orlando; and the latter, who was the daughter of the usurping duke, married Oliver.

Oliv'ia. Twelfth Night, Shakespere. A rich countess, whose love was sought by Orsino, Duke of Illyria; but having lost her brother, Olivia lived for a time in entire seclusion, and in no wise reciprocated the duke's love. Olivia fell in love with Viola, who was dressed as the duke's page, and sent her a ring. Mistaking Sebastian (Viola's brother) for Viola, she married him out of hand.

Ophelia. Hamlet, Shakespere. Daughter of Polonius, the chamberlain. Hamlet fell in love with her, but after his interview with the Ghost, finds that his plans must lead away from her. During his real or assumed madness, he treats her with undeserved and angry rudeness, and afterward, in a fit of inconsiderate rashness, kills her father, the old Polonius. The terrible shock given to her mind by these events completely shatters her intellect, and leads to her accidental death by drowning.

Organon. The name given to the first work on logic by Aristotle. He is said to have created the science of logic. The "Organon" has been enlarged and recast by some modern authors, especially by Mr. John Stuart Mill in his "System of Logic," into a structure commensurate with the vast increase of knowledge and extension of positive method belonging to the present day.

Orlando Furioso. An epic poem in forty-six cantos, by Ariosto, which occupied his leisure for eleven years, and was published in 1516. This poem, which celebrates the semi-mythical achievements of the paladins of Charlemagne, in the wars between the Christians and the Moors, became immediately popular, and has since been translated into all European languages, and passed through innumerable editions.

Ormulum. The "Ormulum" is a collection of metrical homilies, one for each day of the year, but the single existing copy gives the homilies for thirty-two days only. There are very few French words in the poem, but Scandinavian words and constructions abound. The writer, Orm, or Ormin, belonged to the East of England, and he and his brother Walter were Augustinian monks. He makes no use of rhyme, but his verses are smooth and regular.

Osbold'i-stone. Rob Roy, Scott. A family name in the story which tells of nine of the members: (1) the London merchant and Sir Hildebrand, the heads of two families; (2) the son of the merchant is Francis; (3) the offspring of the brother are Percival, the sot; Thorncliffe, the bully; John, the gamekeeper; Richard, the horse-jockey; Wilfred, the fool; and Rashleigh, the scholar, by far the worst of all. This last worthy is slain by Rob Roy, and dies cursing his cousin Frank, whom he had injured.

O'Shanter. See "Tam O'Shanter."

Osman. Sultan of the East, conqueror of the Christians, a magnanimous man. He loved Yara, a young Christian captive. This forms the subject of a once-famous ballad.

Osrick. A court fop in Shakespere's "Hamlet." He is made umpire by Claudius in the combat between Hamlet and Laertes.

Osse'o. Hiawatha, Longfellow. Son of the Evening Star. When broken with age, he married Oweenee, one of ten daughters of a North hunter. She loved him in spite of his ugliness and decrepitude, because "all was beautiful within him." As he was walking with his nine sisters-in-law and their husbands, he leaped into the hollow of an oak tree and came out strong and handsome; but Oweenee at the same moment was changed into a weak old woman. But the love of Osseo was not weakened. The nine brothers and sisters-in-law were transformed into birds. Oweenee, recovering her beauty, had a son, whose delight was to shoot the birds that mocked his father and mother. An Algonquin legend gave the foundation of the story.

Othello. A Moor of Venice, in Shakespere's play of the same name. He marries Desdemona, the daughter of a Venetian senator, and is led by his ensign, Iago, a consummate villain, to distrust her fidelity and virtue. Iago hated the Moor both because Cassio, a Florentine, was preferred to the lieutenantcy instead of himself, and also from a suspicion that the Moor had tampered with his wife; but he concealed his hatred so well that Othello wholly trusted him. Iago persuaded Othello that Desdemona intrigued with Cassio, and urged him on till he murdered his bride.

Othello's Occupation's Gone. A phrase much quoted from the play "Othello," meaning "the task is ended," or that one has retired from active work.

Outre-Mer. A "Pilgrimage Beyond the Sea." This title was given to the work by H. W. Longfellow, published in 1835, and written before European travel was much known to Americans. It is a poetical prose work, not unlike the "Sketch-Book" of Washington Irving.

Pac'olet. In "Valentine and Orson," an old romance, a character who owned an enchanted steed, often alluded to by early writers. The name of Pacolet was borrowed by Steele for his familiar spirit in the "Tatler." The French have a proverb, "It is the horse of Pacolet," that is, it is one that goes very fast.

Pale'mon. The Seasons, Thomson. The hero of an episode in Thomson's "Seasons," represented as the owner of harvest fields in which the lovely young Lavinia coming to glean, Palemon falls in love with her, and woos and wins her. (2) A character in Falconer's "Shipwreck," in love with the daughter of Albert, the commander.

Palimpsest. A parchment on which the original writing has been effaced, and something else has been written. The monks and others used to wash or rub out the writing in a parchment and use it again. As they did not efface it entirely, many works have been recovered by modern ingenuity. Thus Cicero's "De Republica" has been restored from an ancient manuscript which had been partly erased. There are relics of ancient learning of which even the mutilated members have an independent value, and this is especially true of Biblical manuscripts for criticism, and in a still broader sense, of all the remains of the ancient historians.

Palinurus. The pilot of Æneas, in Virgil's "Æneid" who fell asleep at the helm, and tumbled into the sea. The name is employed as a generic word for a steersman or pilot, and sometimes for a chief minister. Thus, Prince Bismarck was called the palinurus of William, Emperor of Germany.

Palladium. Something that affords effectual protection and safety. The Palladium was a colossal wooden statue of Pallas in the city of Troy, said to have fallen from heaven. The statue was carried away by the Greeks, and the city burned. The Scotch had a similar tradition attached to the great stone of Scone, near Perth. Edward I. removed it to Westminster, and it is still framed in the Coronation Chair of England. Stories connected with the palladium of a nation or a family are common in literature, as "Luck of Eden-hall," a poem by Longfellow.

Pallet. A painter in Smollett's novel of "Peregrine Pickle." The absurdities of Pallet are painted an inch thick.

Pame'la. Name of heroine and title of novel by Richardson. She is a simple country girl, and maid-servant of a rich young squire. She resists every temptation, and at length marries the young squire and reforms him. Pamela is very modest, bears her afflictions with much meekness, and is a model of maidenhood. The story is told in a series of letters which Pamela sends to her parents.

Pandarus. A son of Lycaon, and leader of the Lycians in the Trojan War, celebrated by Homer in the "Iliad." In mediæval romances, and by Shakespeare in "Troilus and Cressida," he is represented as procuring for Troilus the love and good graces of Chryseis — hence the word "pander."

Panegyric. An eulogistic harangue or oration, written or uttered in praise of a person or body of persons.

Pan-jan'drum, The Grand. A sort of mythical nonentity invented by Foote, the comic dramatist. The word occurs in Foote's farrago of nonsense, which he composed to test the memory of a person who said he had brought his memory to such perfection that he could remember anything by reading it over once.

Pantag'ruel. A character in a famous romance by Rabelais. The name is said to have been given him because he was born during the drought which lasted thirty and six months, three weeks, four days, thirteen hours, and a little more, in that year of grace noted for having "three Thursdays in one week." His father was Gargantua, the giant, who was four hundred four-score and forty-four years old at the time. He was chained in his cradle with four great iron chains, like those used in ships of the largest size. Being angry at this, he stamped out the bottom of his bassanet, which was made of weavers' beams. When he grew to manhood he knew all languages, all sciences, and all knowledge of every sort.

Pantag'ruleon Law Case. Pantagruel, Rabelais. This case, having nonplussed all the judges in Paris, was referred to Lord Pantagruel for decision. After much "statement" the bench declared, "We have not understood one single circumstance of the defense." Then Pantagruel gave sentence, but his judgment was as unintelligible as the case itself. So, as no one understood a single sentence of the whole affair, all were perfectly satisfied.

Pan-urge'. A celebrated character in Rabelais' "Pantagruel," and the real hero of the story; represented as an arrant rogue, a drunkard, a coward, and a libertine, but learned in the tongues, an ingenious practical joker, and a boon companion. He was the favorite of Pantagruel, who made him governor of Salmygondin, and finally set out with him in quest of the oracle of the Holy Bottle.

Paradise and the Pe'ri. The second tale in Moore's poetical romance of "Lalla Rookh." The Peri laments her expulsion from heaven, and is told she will be readmitted if she will bring to the gate of heaven the "gift most dear to the Almighty." After several failures the Peri offered the "Repentant Tear," and the gates flew open to receive the gift.

Paradise Lost. The poem by Milton under this name opens with the awaking of the rebel angels in hell after their fall from heaven, the consultation of their chiefs how best to carry on the war with God, and the resolve of Satan to go forth and tempt newly created man to fall. Satan reaches Eden, and finds Adam and Eve in their innocence. This is told in the first four books. The next four books contain the Archangel Raphael's story of the war in heaven, the fall of Satan, and the creation of the world. The last four books describe the temptation and the fall of man, and tell of the redemption of man by Christ, and the expulsion from paradise.

Paradise Regained. In this poem Milton tells of the journey of Christ into the wilderness after his baptism, and its four books describe the temptation of Christ by Satan.

Pardoner's Tale. Canterbury Tales, Chaucer. Three rioters agreed to kill Death, and were directed to a tree under which he was to be found. At the foot of the tree they came upon a treasure, which all coveted. The younger of the three went to buy wine and the other two conspired to kill him on his return. He poisoned the wine and was slain by his brothers, who soon died from effect of the poison. Thus all found Death under the tree.

Pa'rian Chronicle. A chronological register of the chief events in the mythology and history of ancient Greece, found engraved on Parian marble.

Pa'rian Verse. Ill-natured satire; so called from Archil'ochos, a native of Paros.

Par'i-zade. A princess whose adventures in search of the Talking Bird, the Singing Tree, and the Yellow Water, are related in the "Story of the Sisters" in the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments."

Parley, Peter. Name assumed by Samuel Griswold Goodrich, an American. Above seven millions of his books were in circulation in 1859. Several piracies of this popular name have appeared.

Parody. A kind of writing in which the words of an author or his thoughts are, by some slight alterations, adapted to a different purpose.

Parthen'ope. One of the three syrens. She was buried at Naples. Naples itself was anciently called Parthenope, which name was changed to "Neap'olis" ("the new city") by a colony of Cumæans.

Par'ting-ton, Mrs. An imaginary old lady whose laughable sayings have been recorded by an American humorist, B. P. Shillaber.

Partlet. The hen in "The Nun's Priest's Tale," and in the famous beast-epic of "Reynard the Fox."

Par'zi-val or Par'si-fal. The German name of Perceval, the hero and title of a metrical romance of the Twelfth Century, by Wolfram Von Eschenbach, and of a modern music drama by Richard Wagner. Parzival was brought up by a widowed mother in solitude, but when grown to manhood, two wandering knights persuaded him to go to the court of King Arthur. His mother consented to his going if he would wear the dress of a common jester. This he did, but soon achieved such noble deeds that Arthur made him a knight of the Round Table. Sir Parzival went in quest of the Holy Graal, which was kept in a castle called Graalburg, in Spain. He reached the castle, but having neglected certain conditions, was shut out, and, on his return to court, the priestess of Graalburg insisted on his being degraded from knighthood. Parzival then led a new life, and a wise hermit became his instructor. At length he reached such a state of purity and sanctity that the priestess of Graalburg declared him worthy to become lord of the castle. Lohengrin, "Knight of the Swan," was the son of Parzival.

Pastoral. Something descriptive of a shepherd's life; or a poem in which any action or passion is represented by its effects on a country life. The characteristics of this poem are simplicity, brevity, and delicacy.

Patient Griselda. A character in "Canterbury Tales," by Chaucer. She was robbed of children, reduced to poverty, and made to serve a rival, but bore all without complaint.

Pat'tieson, Peter. An imaginary assistant teacher at Gandercleuch, and the feigned author of Scott's "Tales of My Landlord," which were represented as having been published posthumously by his pedagogue superior, Jedediah Cleishbotham.

Pau-line'. The "Lady of Lyons" in Bulwer-Lytton's play of this name. She was married to Claude Melnotte, a gardener's son, who pretended to be a count.

Paul and Virginia. A pair of child lovers in Bernardin de St. Pierre's popular romance "Paul et Virginie." According to a tradition, or version, Paul and Virginia are brought up in the belief that they are brother and sister. Don Antonio is sent to bring her to Spain, and make her his bride. She is taken by force on board ship, but scarcely has the ship started, when a hurricane dashes it on rocks, and it is wrecked. Alhambra, a runaway slave, whom Paul and Virginia had befriended, rescues Virginia, who is brought to shore and married to Paul. Antonio is drowned.

Paul Pry. Paul Pry, John Poole. An idle, inquisitive, meddlesome fellow, who has no occupation of his own, and is forever poking his nose into other people's affairs. He always comes in with the apology, "I hope I don't intrude."

Peeping Tom of Coventry. A tailor of Coventry, the only soul in the town mean enough to peep at the Lady Godiva as she rode naked through the streets to relieve the people from oppression.

Peg-got'ty, Clara. The nurse of David Copperfield in Dickens' novel of this name. Being very plump, whenever she makes any exertion some of the buttons on the back of her dress fly off.

Peggotty, Dan'el. Brother of David Copperfield's nurse. Dan'el was a Yarmouth fisherman. His nephew, Ham Peggotty, and his brother-in-law's child, "little Em'ly," lived with him.

Peggotty, Em'ly. She was engaged to Ham Peggotty; but being fascinated with Steerforth she eloped. She was afterwards reclaimed, and emigrated to Australia.

Peggotty, Ham. Represented as the very beautiful of an uneducated, simple-minded, honest, and warm-hearted fisherman. He was drowned in his attempt to rescue Steerforth from the sea.

Pendennis. Name of title and hero of a novel by Thackeray, published in 1849 and 1850, was the immediate successor of "Vanity Fair." Literary life is described in the history of Pen, a hero of no very great worth.

Pendennis, Arthur. A young man of ardent feelings and lively intellect, but self-conceited and selfish.

Pendennis, Laura. His sister has been considered one of the best of Thackeray's characters.

Pendennis, Major. A tuft-hunter, who fawns on his patrons for the sake of wedging himself into their society.

Pendrag'on. A title conferred on several British chiefs in times of great danger, when they were invested with dictatorial power; thus Uter and Arthur were each appointed to the office to repel the Saxon invaders. The word means "chief of the kings."

Pennsylvania Farmer. A surname given to John Dickinson, a citizen of Pennsylvania. In the year 1768, he published his "Letters from a Pennsylvania Farmer to the Inhabitants of the British Colonies." These were republished in London, with a preface by Dr. Franklin, and were subsequently translated into French.

Penny-a-liner. A contributor to the local newspapers, but not on the staff. At one time these collectors of news used to be paid a penny a line on English newspapers, and the appellation is still in use.

Penny Dreadfuls. Penny sensational papers.

Pen'tateuch. A name given by Greek translators to the five books of the Old Testament ascribed to Moses. The chief aim of the Pentateuch is to give a description of the origin and history of the Hebrew people up to the conquest of Canaan, and the theocracy founded among them. Tradition, as preserved in the earliest historical records, mentions Moses as the writer of the complete Pentateuch, such as it is now, with the exception of a few verses describing the last moments of the lawgiver, which have been ascribed to Joshua.

Pepys' Diary. A writing which brought fame to Pepys, the author, was written in short-hand, and deciphered and published in 1825. It extends over the nine years from 1660 to 1669, and is the gossip chronicle of that gay and profligate time. We have no other book which gives so life-like a picture of that extraordinary state of society.

Peregrine Pickle. The hero and title of a novel by Smollett (1751). Peregrine Pickle is a savage, ungrateful spendthrift, fond of practical jokes, and suffering with evil temper the misfortunes brought on himself by his own wilfulness.

Per'o-nel'la. The subject of a fairy tale, represented as a pretty country lass, who, at the offer of a fairy, changes places with an old and decrepit queen, and receives the homage paid to rank and wealth, but afterward gladly resumes her beauty and rags.

Pe-tru'chi-o. A gentleman of Verona, in Shakespeare's "Taming of the Shrew." A very honest fellow, who hardly speaks a word of truth, and succeeds in all his tricks. He acts his assumed character to the life, with untired animal spirits, and without a particle of ill-humor.

Pe'ver-il, Sir Geoff'rey. A country gentleman of strong High-church and Royalist opinions, in Sir Walter Scott's novel "Peveril of the Peak."

Phædo. An ancient and well-known work by Plato, in which the doctrine of the immortality of the soul is most fully set forth. It is in the form of a dialogue which combines with the abstract philosophical discussion, a graphic narrative of the last hours of Socrates, which, for pathos and dignity, is unsurpassed.

Philax. Fairy Tales, D'Aunoy. Philax was cousin to the Princess Imsi. The fay Pagan shut them up in the "Palace of Revenge," a palace containing every delight except the power of leaving it. In the course of a few years, Imsi and Philax longed as much for a separation as at one time they had wished for a union.

Philip. The Madness of Philip, Josephine Daskam. A representation of the unregenerate child — "the child of strong native impulses who has not yet yielded to the shaping force of education; the child, therefore, of originality, of vivacity, of humor, and of fascinating power of invention in the field of mischief."

Philippic. A word used to denote any discourse or declamation full of acrimonious invective. It derives its name from orations made by Demosthenes against Philip of Macedon, in which the orator bitterly attacked the king as the enemy of Greece.

Philistines. Meaning the ill-behaved and ignorant. The word so applied arose in Germany from the Charlies or Philisters, who were always quarreling with the students. Matthew Arnold applied the term Philistine to the middle class in England.

Philo. The Messiah, Klopstock. A Pharisee, one of the Jewish sanhedrim, who hated Caiaphas, the high priest, for being a Sadducee. Philo made a vow that he would take no rest till Jesus was numbered with the dead. He commits suicide, and his soul is carried to hell by Obaddon, the angel of death.

Philtr. Faery Queen, Spenser. A lady of large fortune, betrothed to Bracidas; but, seeing the fortune of Amidas daily increasing, and that of Bracidas getting smaller, she attached herself to the more prosperous younger brother.

Phineas. Uncle Tom's Cabin, Mrs. Stowe. The quaker, an "underground railroad" man who helped the slave family of George and Eliza to reach Canada, after Eliza had crossed the river on cakes of floating ice.

Phyllis. In Virgil's "Eclogues," the name of a rustic maiden. This name, also written Phillis, has been in common use as meaning any unsophisticated country girl.

Pickanin'ny. A young child. A West Indian negro word.

Pickwick, Mr. Samuel. The hero of the "Pickwick Papers," by Charles Dickens. He is a simple-minded, benevolent old gentleman, who wears spectacles and short black gaiters. He founds a club, and travels with its members over England, each member being under his guardianship. They meet many laughable adventures.

Pied Piper of Hamelin. Old German legend. Robert Browning, in his poem entitled "The Pied Piper," has given a metrical version. The legend recounts how a certain musician came into the town of Hamelin, in the country of Brunswick, and offered, for a sum of money, to rid the town of the rats by which it was infested. Having executed his task, and the promised reward having been withheld, he in revenge blew again his pipe, and drew the children of the town to a cavern in the side of a hill, which, upon their entrance, closed and shut them in forever.

Piers Plowman. The hero of a satirical poem of the Fourteenth Century. He falls asleep, like John Bunyan, on the Malvern Hills, and has different visions, which he describes, and in which he exposes the corruptions of society, the dissoluteness of the clergy, and the allurements to sin. The author is supposed to be Robert or William Langland. No other writings so faithfully reflect the popular feeling during the great social and religious movements of that century as the bitterly satirical poem, "The Vision of Piers Ploughman."

In its allegory, the discontent of the Commons with the course of affairs in Church and State found a voice.

Pie'tro. The Ring and the Book, Browning. The professed father of Pompil'ia, criminally assumed as his child to prevent certain property from passing to an heir not his own.

Pilgrim's Progress. Written by Bunyan in the form of a dream to allegorize the life of a Christian, from his conversion to his death. His doubts are giants, his sins a pack, his Bible a chart, his minister Evangelist, his conversion a flight from the City of Destruction, his struggle with besetting sins a fight with Apollyon, his death, a toilsome passage over a deep stream, which flows between him and heaven.

Pilot, The. Title of a sea-story by Cooper, which was called the "first sea-novel of the English language." It was published in the year 1823 and soon translated into Italian, German, and French. It is founded on the adventures of John Paul Jones.

Pinch, Tom. A character in Dickens's "Martin Chuzzlewit," distinguished by his guilelessness, his oddity, and his exhaustless goodness of heart.

Pippa Passes. The title of a dramatic poem by Robert Browning. Pippa is a light-hearted peasant maiden, who resolves to enjoy her holiday. Various groups of persons overhear her as she passes by singing, and some of her stray words act with secret but sure influence for good.

Platonic Love. Spiritual love between persons of opposite sexes. It is the friendship of man and woman, without mixture of what is usually called love. Plato strongly advocated this pure affection, and hence its distinctive name.

Pocket. Great Expectations, Dickens. Name of a family prominent in the story.

Pocket. A real scholar, educated at Harrow, and an honor-man at Cambridge, but, having married young, he had to take up the calling of "grinder" and literary fag for a living. Pip was placed in his care.

Pocket, Mrs. Daughter of a city knight, brought up to be an ornamental nonentity, helpless, shiftless, and useless. She was the mother of eight children, whom she allowed to "tumble up" as best they could, under the charge of her maid Flopson.

Pocket, Herbert. Son of Mr. Matthew Pocket, wonderfully hopeful, but had not the stuff to push his way into wealth.

Pocket, Sarah. Sister of Matthew Pocket, a little dry, old woman, with a small face that might have been made of walnut-shell, and a large mouth.

Poetical Romances. These romances, native to the French, group themselves about great names, some having Alexander, some Charlemagne, as their central figure. One cluster, the Arthurian, is of English growth, and possesses the highest interest of all. Translations and imitations of these French romances slowly came into popular favor with the English people.

Po'lyglot. The word means, in general, an assemblage of versions in different languages of the same work, but is almost exclusively applied to manifold versions of the Bible. Besides the Bible, many other works, or small pieces, have been published in polyglot. Of smaller pieces, the Lord's Prayer has been the favorite, of which many collections have been published since the Fifteenth Century. Of these, the most comprehensive, and the most valuable, is the well-known "Mithridates" of Adelung, which contains the Lord's Prayer in more than 400 languages.

Poor Richard. The assumed name of Benjamin Franklin in a series of almanacs from 1732 to 1757. These almanacs contain maxims and precepts.

Pop'injay. A butterfly man, a fop; so called from the popinjay or figure of a bird shot at for practice. The title is used by Scott in "Old Mortality"; by Shakespeare in "Henry IV.," and by others.

Portia. Merchant of Venice, Shakespere. A rich heiress whom Bassanio loved and who defended Antonio.

Pot-boilers. Articles written and pictures of small merit drawn or painted for the sake of earning daily bread.

Potiphar Papers. A series of brilliant satiric sketches of society written by George W. Curtis in the year 1852, and afterward collected in book form.

Pres'ter, John. The name given, in the middle ages, to a supposed Christian sovereign and priest of the interior of Asia, whose dominions were variously placed. He has been the subject of many legends and is mentioned by Shakespeare in "Much Ado About Nothing."

Primrose, Rev. Charles. Vicar of Wakefield, Goldsmith. A clergymen, rich in heavenly wisdom, but poor indeed in all worldly knowledge.

Primrose, Mrs. Deborah. The doctor's wife, full of motherly vanity, and desirous to appear genteel. She could read without much spelling, and prided herself on her housewifery, especially on her gooseberry wine.

Primrose, George. Son of the vicar. He went to Amsterdam to teach the Dutch English, but never once called to mind that he himself must know something of Dutch before this could be done.

Primrose, Moses. Brother of the above, noted for giving in barter a good horse for a gross of worthless green spectacles with copper rims.

Primrose, Olivia. The eldest daughter of the doctor. Pretty, enthusiastic, a sort of Hebe in beauty. "She wished for many lovers," and eloped with Squire Thornhill.

Primrose, Sophia. The second daughter of Dr. Primrose. She was "soft, modest, and alluring."

Priscilla. Courtship of Miles Standish, Longfellow. A Puritan maiden who is wooed by Captain Standish through the mediation of his friend, John Alden, who is in love with Priscilla. She prefers John Alden and marries him after the captain's supposed death. The captain, however, appears at the close of the wedding service, and the friends are reconciled.

Pros'pero. Tempest, Shakespere. Rightful Duke of Milan, deposed by his brother. Drifted on a desert island, he practiced magic, and raised a tempest in which his brother was shipwrecked. Ultimately Prospero "broke his wand," and his daughter married the son of the King of Naples.

Pynch'eon. The name of an ancient but decayed family in Hawthorne's romance "The House of the Seven Gables." There are: (1) Judge Pyncheon, a selfish, cunning, worldly man. (2) His cousin Clifford, a delicate, sensitive nature, reduced to childishness by long imprisonment and suffering. (3) Hepzibah, the latter's sister, an old maid who devotes herself to the care of Clifford. (4) A second cousin, Phoebe, a fresh, cheerful young girl, who restores the fallen fortunes of the family and removes the curse which rested on it.

Puss in Boots. The subject and title of a well-known nursery tale derived from a fairy story in the "Nights" of the Italian author Straparola, and Charles Perrault's "Contes des Fées." The wonderful cat secures a princess and a fortune for his master, a poor young miller, whom he passes off as the rich Marquis of Carabas.

Quasimo'do. Notre Dame, Hugo. A misshapen dwarf one of the prominent characters in the story. He is brought up in the cathedral of Notre Dame de Paris. One day, he sees Esmeralda, who had been dancing in the cathedral close, set upon by a mob, and he conceals her for a time in the church. When, at length, the beautiful gypsy girl is gibbeted, Quasimodo disappears mysteriously, but a skeleton corresponding to the deformed figure is found after a time in a hole under the gibbet.

Quaver. The Virgin Unmasked, Fielding. A singing-master, who says, "if it were not for singing-masters, men and women might as well have been born dumb." He courts Lucy by promising to give her singing-lessons.

Queen La'be. Arabian Nights. The queen of magic, ruler over the Enchanted City. Beder, Prince of Persia is connected with her in the tale. She transforms men into horses, mules, and other animals. Beder marries her, defeats her plots against him, but is himself turned into an owl for a time.

Quickly, Mistress. Merry Wives of Windsor, Shakespere. A serving woman to Dr. Cains, a French physician. She is the go-between of three suitors for "sweet Anne Page," and with perfect disinterestedness wishes all three to succeed.

Quickly, Mistress Nell. Hostess of a tavern in Eastcheap, frequented by Harry, Prince of Wales, Sir John Falstaff, and all their disreputable crew.

Quid'nunkis. Title and name of hero in a fable found or written by Gay in 1726. This hero was a monkey which climbed higher than its neighbors, and fell into a river. For a few moments the monkey race stood panic-struck, but the stream flowed on, the monkeys continued their gambols. The object of this fable is to show that no one is of sufficient importance to stop the general current of events or cause a gap in nature.

Quilp. Old Curiosity Shop, Dickens. A hideous dwarf, cunning, malicious, and a perfect master in tormenting. Of hard, forbidding features, with head and face large enough for a giant. He lived on Tower Hill, collected rents, advanced money to seamen, and kept a sort of wharf, containing rusty anchors, huge iron rings, piles of rotten wood, and sheets of old copper, calling himself a ship-breaker. He was on the point of being arrested for felony, when he drowned himself.

Quilp, Mrs. Wife of the dwarf, a young, obedient, and pretty little woman, treated like a dog by her husband, whom she loved but more greatly feared.

Quintessence. "The fifth essence." In the modern and general sense, an epithet applied to an extract which contains the most essential part of anything. It is quite an error to suppose that the word means an essence five times distilled, and that the term came from the alchemists. The ancient Greeks said there are four elements or forms in which matter can exist—fire, or the imponderable form; air, or the gaseous form; water, or the liquid form; and earth, or the solid form. The Pythagore'ans added a fifth, which they call "ether," more subtle and pure than fire, and possessed of an orbicular motion. This element, which flew upwards at creation, and out of which the stars were made, was called the "fifth essence"; quintessence, therefore, means the most subtle extract of a body that can be procured.

Quintillians. These were the disciples of Quintillia, who was said to be a prophetess. These so-called heretical Christians allowed women to become priests and bishops.

Quintus Fixlein. Title of a romance by Jean Paul Richter and the name of the principal character.

Quixote. See Don Quixote.

Quixote of the North. Charles XII. of Sweden, sometimes called in derision the Madman, was also called the Quixote of the North.

Quixotic. Like Don Quixote, or one who has foolish and impractical schemes—a would-be reformer.

Quodling, The Rev. Mr. Peveril of the Peak, Scott. Chaplain to the Duke of Buckingham.

Rad'igund. Faery Queen, Spenser. Queen of the fabled Amazons. Having been rejected by Bellodant "the Bold," she revenged herself by degrading all the men who fell into her power by dressing them like women, and giving them women's work.

Ramona. Name of heroine and title of romance by Helen Hunt Jackson. Ramona saw the American Indian followed by "civilization" while retreating slowly but surely toward his own extinction, and had herself a share in the tragedy. Ramona is considered the great romance of Indian life.

Rasselas. An imaginary prince hero of the romance by Dr. Johnson bearing same title. According to the custom of his country, Abyssinia, he was confined in paradise, with the rest of the royal family. This paradise was in the valley of Amhara, surrounded by high mountains. It had only one entrance, a cavern concealed by woods, and closed by iron gates. He escaped with his sister Nekayah and Imlac the poet, and wandered about to find what condition or rank of life was the most happy. After careful investigation, he found no lot without its drawbacks, and resolved to return to the "happy valley."

Raud the Strong. Tales of a Wayside Inn, H. W. Longfellow. The viking who worshiped the old gods and lived by fire and sword. King Olaf went against him sailing from Dronthiem to Salten Fjord.

Ra'venswood. Bride of Lammermoor, Scott. The lord of Ravenswood an old Scotch nobleman and a decayed royalist. His son Edgar falls in love with Lucy Ashton, daughter of Sir William Ashton, Lord-Keeper of Scotland. The lovers plight their troth, but Lucy is compelled to marry Frank Hayston, laird of Bucklaw. The bride, in a fit of insanity, attempts to murder the bridegroom and dies. Bucklaw goes abroad. Colonel Ashton, seeing Edgar at the funeral of Lucy, appoints a hostile meeting; and Edgar, on his way to the place appointed, is lost in the quicksands. A prophecy, noted as a curse, hung over the family and was thus fulfilled.

Ran'dom. Roderick Random, Smollet. A young Scotch scapegrace in quest of fortune. At one time he revels in prosperity, again he is in utter destitution. He roams at random, in keeping with his name.

Rappacci'ni. Mosses from an Old Manse, Hawthorne. A doctor in whose garden grew strange plants whose juices and fragrance were poison. His daughter, nourished on these odors became poisonous herself, her lover found an antidote which she took, but the poison meant life and the antidote meant death to her.

Ray'mond. In Jerusalem Delivered by Tasso. Raymond was known as the Nestor of the Crusaders, slew Aladine, the king of Jerusalem, and planted the Christian standard upon the tower of David.

Rebec'ca. Ivanhoe, Scott. Daughter of Isaac the Jew, in love with Ivanhoe. Rebecca, with her father and Ivanhoe, as prisoners, are confined in Front de Bœuf's castle. Rebecca is taken to the turret chamber and left with the old sibyl, but when Brian de Bois Guilbert comes to her, she spurns him with heroic disdain. Ivanhoe, who was suffering from wounds received in a tournament, is nursed by Rebecca. After escape and adventure, and being again prisoner, the Grand Master commands the Jewish maiden to be tried for sorcery, and she demands a trial by combat. The demand is granted, when Brian de Bois Guilbert is appointed as the champion against her; and Ivanhoe undertakes her defense, slays Brian, and Rebecca is set free. In contrast with this strong character, Rowena seems insignificant even when she becomes the bride of Ivanhoe. Scott is said to have named Rebecca from the beautiful Rebecca Gratz of Philadelphia, described to him by Washington Irving.

Red-Cross Knight. The Red-Cross Knight is St. George, the patron saint of England, and, in the obvious and general interpretation, typifies Holiness, or the perfection of the spiritual man in religion. In Spenser's "Faëry Queen" the task of slaying a dragon was assigned to him as the champion of Una.

Red'-gaunt'let. One of the principal characters in Sir Walter Scott's novel of the same name, a political enthusiast and Jacobite, who scruples at no means of upholding the cause of the Pretender, and finally accompanies him into exile. His race bore a fatal mark resembling a horse-shoe which appeared on the face of Red-gauntlet as he frowned when angry.

Red-Riding-Hood. This nursery tale is, with slight variations, common to Sweden, Germany, and France. In Charles Perrault's "Contes des Fées" it is called "Le Petit Chaperon Rouge."

Representative Men. In this work Emerson, more nearly than in any of his other works, gives expression to his system as a whole. The topics are, (1) Plato, the Philosopher; (2) Swedenborg, the Mystic; (3) Montaigne the Skeptic; (4) Shakespeare, the Poet; (5) Napoleon, the Man of the World; (6) Goethe, the Writer. The mental portraits sketched under these six heads give us Emerson himself, so far as he is capable of being formulated at all.

Republic, The. A work composed by Plato 400 years before Christ. The "Republic" is not, as the title would suggest, a political work, like the "Politics" of Aristotle. The principles and government of an ideal moral organism, of which the rulers shall be types of fully developed and perfectly educated men, is the real subject. In the "Republic" we find the necessity of virtue to the very idea of social life proved in the first book; then the whole process of a complete moral and scientific education is set forth. It has been said that the most complete record of the beliefs or opinions of Plato are found in this work.

Reveries of a Bachelor. Name of a writing by D. G. Mitchell. This "Reveries" is a collection of sketches of life and character, painted in such a dream-like, delicate manner as to make the reader lose for the time being the full consciousness of his own reality. It has called forth a number of imitators more or less successful, no one of whom, however, is comparable to the original.

Reyn'ard the Fox. The hero in the beast-epic, a celebrated epic fable of the Middle Ages, belonging to and terminating the series of poems in which "beasts" are the speakers and actors. It is written in Low-German, professedly by a Hinreck van Alckmer, and was printed in the year 1498. Before Jacob Grimm published the results of his laborious researches, it was believed that the poem printed at Lübeck in 1498 was the earliest literary embodiment, if not the direct source, of the fable. Grimm has shown that, in one form or another, the "beast-fable" goes back to the remotest antiquity, and is a common inheritance of the Aryan or Indo-Germanic races. According to many authorities this prose poem, in its present form, is a satire on the state of Germany in the Middle Ages. Reynard typifies the Church; his uncle, Isengrin the wolf, typifies the baronical element; and Nodel the lion, the regal. However that may be, in the real fable, Reynard the Fox has a constant impulse to deceive and victimize every body, whether friend or foe, but especially Isengrin; and, though the latter frequently reduces him to the greatest straits, he generally gets the better of it in the end. The work now consulted by general readers is Goethe's version which has been translated into English.

Rhapsody means songs strung together. The term was originally applied to the books of the "Iliad" and "Odyssey," which at one time were in fragments. Certain bards collected together a number of the fragments, enough to make a connected "ballad," and sang them as our minstrels sang the deeds of famous heroes.

Rigolette'. The name of a female character in Eugene Sue's "Mysteries of Paris." It has acquired a proverbial currency, and is used as a synonym of "gri-sette."

Rinal'do. In Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered" he belonged to the army of the Christians. He was the son of Bertoldo and Sophia, and nephew of Guelpho, but was brought up by Matilda. The name, Rinaldo, is also found in Bojardo's "Orlando Innamorato," in Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso," and in other romantic tales of Italy and France. He was one of Charlemagne's Paladins, and cousin to Orlando. Having killed Charlemagne's nephew Berthelot, he was banished and outlawed. After various adventures and disasters, he went to the Holy Land, and, on his return, succeeded in making peace with the emperor.

Ring and the Book, The. An idyllic epic, by Robert Browning, founded on Italian history. Guido Franceschini, a Florentine Count of shattered fortune, married Pompilia, thinking her to be an heiress. Finding this a mistake the count treated Pompilia so brutally that she left him under the protection of Caponsacchi, a young priest, and being arrested at Rome, a legal separation took place. Pompilia sued for a divorce, but, pending the suit, gave birth to a son. The count murdered Pompilia, and Pietro and Violantê, her supposed parents, but being taken red-handed, was brought to trial, found guilty, and executed.

Rip Van Winkle. Sketch Book, Irving. An indolent, good-natured fellow, living in a village on the Hudson. While shooting among the Catskill Mountains he meets with a stranger whom he helps in carrying a keg over rocks and cliffs; with him he joins a party who are silently rolling ninepins. Rip Van Winkle drinks deeply of the liquor they furnish, and falls into a sleep which lasts twenty years, during which the Revolutionary War takes place. After awaking, Rip returns to the village, finds himself almost forgotten and makes friends with the new generation. The name of the great actor, Joseph Jefferson, became so identified with this character that to the English-speaking world he was Rip Van Winkle.

Robert the Devil. The hero of an old French metrical romance of the Thirteenth Century, the same as Robert, first Duke of Normandy, who became an early object of legendary scandal. Having been given over to the Devil before birth, he ran a career of cruelties and crimes unparalleled, till he was miraculously reclaimed, did penance, and became a shining light, and married the emperor's daughter. In the Eleventh Century the romance was turned into prose, and of the prose story two translations were made into English. There was also a miracle play on the same subject. The opera of "Robert le Diable" was composed by Meyerbeer, in 1826.

Robin des Bois. In Germany, a mysterious hunter of the forest. Robin des Bois occurs in one of Eugene Sue's novels "as a well-known mythical character whose name is employed by French mothers to frighten their children."

Robin Goodfellow. Sometimes called Puck, son of Oberon, a domestic spirit, the constant attendant on the English fairy-court; full of tricks and fond of practical jokes. He is also considered the same as Lob-lie-by-the-fire, in some tales. His character and achievements are recorded in the well-known ballad beginning "From Oberon in Fairy-land." Wright, in his "Essays on the Literature, Superstitions, and History of England in the Middle Ages," suspects Robin Goodfellow to have been the Robin Hood of the old popular Morris dance.

Robin Hood. A famous English outlaw whose exploits are the subjects of many ballads, but of whose actual existence little or no evidence can be discovered. Various periods, ranging from the time of Richard I. to near the end of the reign of Edward II., have been assigned as the age in which he lived. He is usually described as a yeoman, and his chief residence is said to have been the forest of Sherwood, in Nottinghamshire. Of his followers, the most noted are Little John; his chaplain, Friar Tuck; and his companion, Maid Marian. The popular legends extol his personal courage and generosity, and his skill in archery. Scott introduces Robin Hood in two novels — "Ivanhoe" and "The Talisman." In the former he first appears as Locksley the archer, at the tournament.

Robinson Cru'soe. A tale by Daniel Defoe. Robinson Crusoe went to sea, was wrecked, lived on an uninhabited island of the tropics, and relieved the weariness of life by numberless contrivances. At length he met a young Indian, whom he saved from death. He called him his "man Friday," and made him his companion and servant. This story has been translated into more languages than any other English book.

Rob Roy. The title and hero of a novel by Sir Walter Scott. It signifies "Rob the Red," and was the sobriquet of a famous Scottish outlaw, Robert MacGregor, the chief of the clan MacGregor.

Roderick Dhu. Lady of the Lake, Scott. An outlaw and chief of a band of Scots who resolved to win back what had been lost to the Saxons. In connection with Red Murdock he sought the life of the Saxon Fitz James.

Roderigo. In Shakespere's "Othello," a Venetian in love with Desdemona, who when the lady eloped with Othello, hated the "noble Moor."

Roger Drake. Name of hero and title of novel by H. K. Webster. "Captain of Industry" is the added appellation to name of hero, who is interested in the working of a copper-mine, the founding of a trust, the change from the old-fashioned trust to the simple plan of one monster corporation, and the deadly business fight for supremacy found in modern industrial struggles.

Ro'land. The hero of one of the most ancient and popular epics of early French or Frankish literature, was, according to tradition, the favorite nephew and captain of the Emperor Charlemagne. In Italian romance he is called Orlan'do. He was slain in the valley of Roncesvallês as he was leading the rear of the army from Spain to France. The oldest version of the "Song of Roland," forming part of the "Chansons de Geste," which treat of the achievements of Charlemagne and his paladins, belongs to the Eleventh Century. Throughout the Middle Ages, the "Song of Roland" was the most popular of the many heroic poems, and William of Normandy, when on his way to conquer England, had it sung at the head of his troops, to encourage them on their march. At the present day, the traditionary memory of the heroic paladin is still held in honor by the hardy mountaineers of the Pyrenees, amongst whose dangerous defiles the scene of his exploits and death is laid. Roland is the hero of Théroulde's "Chanson de Roland," of Turpin's "Chronique"; of Bojardo's "Orlando Innamorato"; of Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso."

Romance of the Rose. A poetical allegory, begun by Guillaume de Lorris in the latter part of the Thirteenth Century, and continued by Jean de Meung in the former half of the Fourteenth Century. The poet dreams that Dame Idleness conducts him to the palace of Pleasure, where he meets many adventures among the attendant maidens, Youth, Joy, Courtesy, and others by whom he is conducted to a bed of roses. He singles out one, when an arrow from Love's bow stretches him fainting on the ground. Fear, Slander, and Jealousy are afterward introduced.

Romances. The French troubadours composed romances and sung them at the courts of the Norman kings. Richard I. was himself a troubadour. The subjects of the romances were generally the deeds of Charlemagne and his knights, or of King Arthur and his knights, and a little later tales of the Crusaders became popular. Old tales were retold, and the incidents were transferred to Eastern lands. From the time of Edward II. many of these tales were translated into English.

Ro'me-o. In Shakespere's tragedy of "Romeo and Juliet," a son of Montague, in love with Juliet, the daughter of Capulet, who was the head of a noble house of Verona, in feudal enmity with the house of Montague.

Ro'mulus. The mythical founder of the city of Rome. His name is only a lengthened form of Romus, and he is, therefore, to be regarded as a symbolical representation of the Roman people.

Rosetta Stone. Found at Rosetta in the delta of the Nile, contains equivalent inscriptions in hieroglyphics and in Greek letters. The meaning of the Greek text being known the hieroglyphics could be translated.

Round Table, The. History of Prince Arthur, Sir T. Malory. A table made by Merlin for Uther the pendragon. Uther gave it to King Leodegraunce of Camel-yard, and when Arthur married Guinevere (the daughter of Leodegraunce), he received the table with a hundred knights as a wedding present. The table would seat 150 knights, and each seat was appropriated. What is usually meant by Arthur's Round Table is a smaller one for the accommodation of twelve favorite knights. King Arthur instituted an order of knighthood called "the knights of the Round Table," the chief of whom were Sir Lancelot, Sir Tristram, and Sir Lamerock or Lamorake. The "Siege Perilous" was reserved for Sir Gala-had, the son of Sir Lancelot by Elaine.

Roussillon, Alice. The heroine of the romance, "Alice of Old Vincennes" by Maurice Thompson. Her guardian was Gaspard Roussillon, a successful trader with the Indians. "Eat frogs and save your scalps" was the plan of the Latin Creoles. "Papa Roussillon" was a frog-eater and the ruling spirit in his little village. The English and their Indian allies arranged their attack on the fort at Vincennes, and the American flag was in danger. Alice, with the help of a cripple boy, Jean, stole the flag, no search or questioning could reveal the whereabouts of either flag or thief, and at the end of the siege it was produced, much to the amazement of General Hamilton. Alice forgot her flag for a moment in the appearance of her lover, Beverly, whom she had mourned as dead, but Jean raised it on a staff from which the stars and stripes still float.

Ruach. Pantagruel, Rabelais. The isle of winds, visited by Pantagruel and his companions. The people of this island live on wind, such as flattery, promises, and hope. The poorer sort are very ill-fed, but the great are stuffed with huge mill-draughts of the same unsubstantial puffs.

Ru'be-zahl. The name of a famous spirit of the Riesen-Gebirge in Germany, corresponding to the Puck of England. He is celebrated in innumerable sagas, ballads, and tales, under the various forms of a miner, hunter, monk, dwarf, giant, etc. He is said to aid the poor and oppressed, and show benighted wanderers their road, but to wage incessant war with the proud and wicked.

Rudge. Barnaby Rudge, Dickens. Barnaby, a half-witted lad, with pale face, red hair and protruding eyes, dressed in tawdry finery including peacock feathers in his hat, is the hero of the novel with his inseparable companion, a raven, also of much interest. Barnaby joined the Gordon rioters for the proud pleasure of carrying a flag and wearing a blue bow. He was arrested and lodged in Newgate, from whence he made his escape, with other prisoners, when the jail was burned but both he and his father being betrayed, were recaptured, brought to trial, and condemned to death. By the influence of Gabriel Varden, the locksmith, the poor half-witted lad was reprieved. Mr. Rudge, the father of Barnaby, supposed to have been murdered the same night as Mr. Haredale, to whom he was steward. Rudge himself was the murderer both of Mr. Haredale and also of his faithful servant, to whom the crime was attributed. After the murder, he was seen by many haunting the locality, and was supposed to be a ghost. He joined the Gordon rioters. Mrs. [Mary] Rudge, mother of Barnaby, and very like him, "but where in his face there was wildness and vacancy, in hers there was the patient composure of sorrow.

Ruggie'ro. Orlando Furioso, Ariosto. A young Saracen knight born of Christian parents, who falls in love with Bradamante, a Christian Amazon, and sister to Rinaldo. After numerous adventures and crosses, they marry and found the house of Este. Ruggiero is noted for the possession of a hippogriff, or winged horse, and also a veiled shield, the dazzling splendor of which, when suddenly disclosed, struck with blindness and astonishment all eyes that beheld it.

Rumpelstilz'chen. Old German Tales. According to Grimm, this name is a compound, but the spirit represented is one familiar to all German children. The original story tells of him as a dwarf who spun straw into gold for a certain miller's daughter. He has since done favors to many people and paid visits from his mountain home only known by the results of his helpfulness.

Runes, the earliest alphabet in use among the nations of Northern Europe. The exact period of their origin is not known. They are found engraved on rocks, crosses, monumental stones, coins, medals, rings, brooches, and the hilts and blades of swords. There is no reason to believe that they were at any time in the familiar use in which we find the characters of a written language in modern times, nor have we any traces of their being used in books or on parchment.

Ru'pert, Knight. Formerly in the villages of Northern Germany, a personage clad in high buskins, white robe, mask, and enormous wig, who at Christmas time distributes presents to the children. Like St. Nicholas, he keeps watch over naughty children. The horseman in the May pageant is in some parts of Germany called Ruprecht, or Rupert.

Rustam. Persian Romances. He is the chief of the Persian mythical heroes, son of Zâl, King of India, and descendant of Benjamin, the beloved son of Jacob. He delivered King Caicaus from prison, but afterwards fell into disgrace because he refused to embrace the religious system of Zoroaster. Caicaus sent his son Asfendiar to convert him, and, as persuasion availed nothing, single combat was resorted to. The fight lasted two days, and then Rustam discovered that Asfendiar bore a "charmed life." The valor of these two heroes is proverbial, and the Persian romances are full of their deeds. "Schrab and Rustam" form the subject of a poetical romance by Matthew Arnold.

Ruy'dera. Don Quixote, Cervantes. A duenna who had seven daughters and two nieces. They were imprisoned for 500 years in a cavern in Spain. Their ceaseless weeping stirred the compassion of Merlin, who converted them into lakes in the same province.

Sac'ri-pant, King. (1) King of Circassia, and a lover of Angelica, in Bojardo and Ariosto. (2) A personage introduced by Alessandro Tassoni, the Italian poet, in his mock-heroic poem, entitled the "Rape of the Bucket," represented as false, brave, noisy, and hectoring. The name is quoted as a synonym with vanity and braggart courage.

Sagas. The name given to those ancient traditions which form the substance of the history and mythology of the Scandinavian races: the language in which they are written is supposed to be the old Icelandic. In the "Edda" there are numerous sagas. As our Bible contains the history of the Jews, religious songs, moral proverbs, and religious stories, so the "Edda" contained the history of Norway, religious songs, a book of proverbs, and numerous stories. The original "Edda" was compiled and edited by Sæmund Sigfusson, an Icelandic priest and scald, in the Eleventh Century. It contains twenty-eight parts or books, all of which are in verse. Two hundred years later, Snorro Sturleson of Iceland abridged, rearranged, and reduced to prose the "Edda," and his work was called "The Younger Edda." In this we find the famous story called by the Germans the "Nibelungen Lied." Besides the sagas contained in the "Eddas," there are numerous others, and the whole saga literature makes over 200 volumes. Among them are the "Völsunga Saga" which is a collection of lays about the early Teutonic heroes. The "Saga of St. Olaf" is the history of this Norwegian king. "Frithjof's Saga" contains the life and adventures of Frithjof of Iceland. Snorro Sturleson, at the close of the Twelfth Century, made the second great collection of chronicles in verse, called the "Heimskringla Saga," This is a most valuable record of the laws, customs, and manners of the ancient Scandinavians.

Seasons. A well-known poem said to be the foundation of Thomson's literary fame. Its description of the phenomena of nature during an English year is minute, and the poem has been much read by foreigners.

St. Leon. The title of a novel by William Goodwin and the name of its hero, a man who becomes possessed of the elixir of life, and the secret of the transmutation of metals—acquisitions which only bring him misfortunes and much protracted misery.

St. Nich'o-las. The patron saint of boys. He is said to have been Bishop of Myra, and to have died in the year 326. The young were universally taught to revere him, and the popular fiction which represents him as the bearer of presents to children on Christmas eve is well known. He is the Santa Claus (or Klaus) of the Dutch.

St. Patrick's Purgatory. The subject and locality of a legend long famous throughout Europe. The scene is laid in Ireland, upon an islet in Lough Derg. The punishments undergone here are analogous to those described by Dante in his "Divina Commedia." The story was made the subject of a romance in the Fourteenth Century: and, in Spain, in the Seventeenth Century, it was dramatized by Calderon.

St. Swith'in. According to legend this saint was tutor to King Alfred and Bishop of Winchester, and many miracles are attributed to him, especially the rain of St. Swith'in's Day.

Salmagundi. The name of a periodical started by Washington Irving, his brother, and James K. Paulding, in the year 1807. The object of the paper was the same as that of the "Spectator," "to reform the town." The publishers became tired of their venture before their subscribers did, and only twenty numbers were issued. The political pieces were full of humor, but were not in support of any party. The wit and satire were connected with things local and would not be thoroughly understood now, or appreciated. The writers touched upon the follies of fashionable life as well as other follies of their day.

Salt-Box House. Title of book by J. D. Shelton and name given to an imaginary house supposed to stand in a Connecticut hill town more than a century ago. The life of the family to whom the house belonged is followed for three generations. The people, like most families of the same social station, had no sympathy with the war for colonial independence. They have little to do with political life, but in their every-day concerns, work and play, school and church, love and marriage, sickness and death, with their old-time customs, traditions and habits of thought they are very interesting. Miss Mary, the last mistress of the Salt-Box House, is a most attractive old maid.

Salt River. An imaginary river, up which defeated political parties are supposed to be sent to oblivion. The name and application said to have originated in the United States and in connection with a river of Kentucky. It is called an American cant or slang name.

Sam'bo. This term and the name Cuffey used to designate the negro race. Both used by Mrs. Stowe in her stories.

Samian Letter, The. The letter Y used by Pythagoras as an emblem of the paths of virtue and of vice.

Samian Sage. Pythagoras, said to have been born at Samos.

Sampson, Dominie. See Dominie Sampson.

Samson Agonistes. The principal character in Milton's sacred drama, "Samson Agonistes" or "Samson the Combatant." Samson blind and bound triumphs over his enemies. As in the Bible story, he grasps two of the supporting pillars and perishes in the general ruin.

Sancho Panza. The esquire and counterpart of Don Quixote in Cervantes' famous novel. He has much shrewdness in practical matters and a store of proverbial wisdom. He rode upon an ass which he dearly loved, and was noted for his proverbs.

Sandals of Theramenes. Which would fit any foot. Theramenes, one of the Athenian oligarchy, was nicknamed "the trimmer" from the name of a sandal or boot which might be worn on either foot, because no dependence could be placed on him. The proverb, "He walks in the sandals of Theramenes" is applied to those who speak fairly but do the things that promise to profit themselves.

Sand'ford and Mer'ton. Harry Sandford and Tommy Merton, the two heroes of Thomas Day's once popular tale for the young, the "History of Sandford and Merton" (1783-1789).

Sanscrit. The ancient language of India, now extinct, from which most of the languages there spoken are derived. It belongs to the Aryan or Indo-European group of tongues. It was declared by Sir William Jones to be more perfect than the Greek, more copious than the Latin, and more refined than either. The earliest existing work is the "Vedas." These, and the "Puranas," are religious writings; but there are also Epic poems, dramas, and philosophical composition.

Santa Claus. In fable he was first known as patron saint of children. The vigil of his feast is still held in some places, but for the most part his name is now associated with Christmas-tide. The old custom used to be for someone, on December 5th, to assume the costume of a bishop and distribute small gifts to "good children." (See St. Nicholas.)

Santia'go. The war cry of Spain; adopted because St. James (Sant Iago) rendered, according to tradition, signal service to a Christian king of Spain in a battle against the Moors.

Sa'tan. One of the names of the Devil, and that by which in the Bible, in poetry, and in popular legends, he is often designated. Those mediæval writers who reckoned nine kinds of demons, placed Satan at the head of the fifth rank, which consisted of cozeners, as magicians and witches. Milton represents him as the monarch of hell. His chief lords are Beëlzebub, Moloch, Chemos, Thammuz, Dagon, Rimmon, and Belial. His standard-bearer, Azaz'el.

Sat'yraue. Faerie Queene, Spenser. A noble knight who delivered Una from the fauns and satyrs. The meaning seems to be that Truth, driven from the towns and cities, took refuge in caves and dens, where for a time it lay concealed. At length Sir Satyrane (Luther) rescues Una from bondage: but no sooner is this the case than she falls in with Archima'go, to show how very difficult it was at the Reformation to separate Truth from Error.

Saun'ders, Clerk. The hero of a well-known Scottish ballad.

Saun'ders, Richard. A feigned name under which Dr. Franklin, in 1732, commenced the publication of an almanac, commonly called "Poor Richard's Almanac," of which the distinguishing feature was a series of maxims of prudence and industry in the form of proverbs.

Saw'ney. A sportive designation applied by the English to the Scotch. It is a corruption of "Sandie," the Scottish abbreviation of "Alexander."

Saw'yer, Bob. Pickwick Papers, Dickens. A drinking young doctor who tries to establish a practice at Bristol, but without success. Sam Weller calls him "Mr. Sawbones."

Scalds, or Skalds. Court poets and chroniclers of the ancient Scandinavians. They resided at court, were attached to the royal suite, and attended the king in all his wars. These bards celebrated in song the gods, the kings of Norway, and national heroes. Few complete Skaldic poems have survived, but a multitude of fragments exist.

Scarlet Letter, The. Title of a romance by Nathaniel Hawthorne. The heroine, Hester Prynne, was condemned to wear conspicuously the letter "A" in scarlet, token of her sin as mother of her child, Pearl, whose father was not known. She was first exposed in disgrace on a raised scaffold, then served a term in prison, and afterward gained a moderate support for herself and child by embroidering. She refused to reveal the name of the father, although she might then be allowed to lay aside the letter. He was always near, held an important position, and lived a life of wearing remorse. After his death Hester Prynne took her child to another country, but returned to spend her old age in seclusion and comfort in the same place that had witnessed her punishment. She always bore herself proudly but not defiantly and brought to herself such love and respect that the scarlet letter became a badge of honor. Roger Chillingworth, Hester's husband, appeared as a learned foreign physician, visited her in prison but promised not to reveal his relation to her and devoted his life to learning her secret. The characters in the story are intense and the analysis of motives subtle.

Schah'riah. Arabian Nights. The Sultan of Persia. His reign was a despotism and his decrees absolute.

Schehe'razade. Arabian Nights. The fabled relater of the stories in these "Entertainments." Among other decrees the sultan had decided upon a new wife for every day. Tradition or fable tells that Scheherazade, wishing to free Persia of this disgrace, requested to be made the sultan's wife. She was young and beautiful, of great courage and ready wit, had an excellent memory, knew history, was poet, musician, and dancer. Scheherazade obtained permission for her younger sister, Dinarzade, to sleep in the same chamber, and instructed her to say, "Sister, relate to me one of those stories." Scheherazade then told the sultan (under pretense of speaking to her sister) a story, but always contrived to break off before the story was finished. The sultan, in order to hear the end of the story, spared her life till the next night. This went on for a thousand and one nights, when the sultan's resentment was worn out, and his admiration of his sultana was so great that he revoked his decree.

Schle'mil, Peter. The title of a little work by Chamisso (1781-1838), and the name of its hero, a man who sells his shadow to an old man in gray (the Devil) who meets him just after he has been disappointed in an application for assistance to a nobleman. The name has become a by-word for any poor, silly, and unfortunate fellow.

Scourge of God. Attila, King of the Huns. A. P. Stanley says the term was first applied to Attila in the Hungarian Chronicles. It is found in a legend belonging to the Eighth or Ninth Century.

Scrooge, Ebenezer. Christmas Carol, Dickens. The prominent character, made partner, executor, and heir of old Jacob Marley, stock-broker. When first introduced, he is a grasping, covetous old man, loving no one and by none beloved. One Christmas, Ebenezer Scrooge sees three ghosts: The Ghost of Christmas Past; the Ghost of Christmas Present; and the Ghost of Christmas To-come. The first takes him back to his young life, shows him what Christmas was to him when a school-boy, and when he was an apprentice. The second ghost shows him the joyous home of his clerk, Bob Cratchit, who has nine people to feed on what seems a pittance, and yet could find wherewithal to make merry on this day; it also shows him the family of his nephew, and others. The third ghost shows him what would be his lot if he died as he then was, the prey of harpies, the jest of his friends on 'Change. These visions wholly change his nature, and he becomes benevolent, charitable, and cheerful, and makes Christmas a happy day for many within his reach.

Sed'ley, Mr. Vanity Fair, Thackeray. A wealthy London stock-broker, brought to ruin in the money market just prior to the battle of Waterloo. The old merchant tried to earn a living by selling wine, coals, or lottery-tickets by commission, but his bad wine and cheap coals found but few customers. Mrs. Sedley, wife of Mr. Sedley, a homely, kind-hearted woman, soured by adversity, and quick to take offense. Amelia Sedley, daughter of the stock-broker, educated at Miss Pinkerton's academy, and engaged to Captain George Osborne, son of a rich London merchant. After the ruin of Mr. Sedley George marries Amelia, and old Osborne disinherits him. George is killed in the Battle of Waterloo. Amelia is reduced to great poverty, but is befriended by Captain Dobbin, and after many years of patience and great devotion she consents to marry him. Joseph Sedley, vain, shy, and vulgar. He told of his brave deeds, and made it appear that he was Wellington's right hand; so that he obtained the sobriquet of "Waterloo Sedley." He became the "patron" of Becky Sharp, who fleeced him of all his money, and in six months he died under suspicious circumstances. Interest in the novel is centered on Amelia, an impersonation of virtue without intellect as contrasted with Becky Sharp, who is an impersonation of intellect without virtue. The one has no head, the other no heart.

Sel'm. Bride of Abydos, Byron. The character of Selim is bold, full of enterprise, and faithful. The story runs that Selim was the son of Abdallah and cousin of Zuleika. When Giaffir murdered Abdallah, he took Selim and brought him up as his own son. The young man fell in love with Zuleika, who thought he was her brother; when she discovered he was Abdallah's son, she eloped with him. As soon as Giaffir discovered this he went after the fugitives, and shot Selim. Zuleika killed herself, and the old pacha was left childless. Selim, son of Akbar, in Arabian tales, marries Nourmahal, the "Light of the Harem."

Sel'ith. The Messiah, Klopstock. One of the two guardian angels of the Virgin Mary and of John the Divine.

Sellock. Peveril of the Peak, Scott. A servant girl in the service of Lady and Sir Geoffrey Peveril of the Peak.

Sen'e'na. Madoc, Southey. A Welsh maiden in love with Car'adoc. Under the assumed name of Mervyn she became the page of the Princess Goervyl, that she might follow her lover to America, when Madoc colonized Caer-Madoc. Senena was promised in marriage to another; but when the wedding day arrived, the bride was nowhere to be found.

Sentimental Journey, The. By Laurence Sterne. It was intended to be sentimental sketches of his tour through Italy in 1764, but he died soon after completing the first part.

Septuagint. A Greek version of the books of the Old Testament; so called because the translation is supposed to have been made by seventy-two Jews, who, for the sake of round numbers, are usually called the "seventy interpreters." It is said to have been made at the request of Ptolemy Philadelphus, King of Egypt, about 280 B. C. It is that out of which all the citations in the New Testament from the Old are taken. It was also the ordinary and canonical translation made use of by the Christian Church in the earliest ages; and is still retained in the churches both of the East and West.

Sere'na. Faerie Queene, Spenser. Allured by the mildness of the weather, went into the fields to gather wild flowers for a garland, when she was attacked by the Blatant Beast, who carried her off in its mouth. Her cries attracted to the spot Sir Calidore, who compelled the beast to drop its prey.

Ses'ame. In Arabian tales given as the talismanic word which would open or shut the door leading into the cave of the forty thieves. In order to open it, the words to be uttered were, "Open, Sesame!" and in order to close it, "Shut, Sesame!" Sesame is a plant which yields an oily grain, and hence, when Cassim forgot the word, he substituted "barley," but without effect. Sesame has come into general use in connection with any word or act which will open the way for accomplishment of the thing desired.

Seven Bibles, The, or Sacred Books. (1) The "Bible" of Christians. (2) The "Eddas" of the Scandinavians. (3) The "Five Kings" of the Chinese. (4) The "Koran" of the Mohammedans. (5) The "Tri Pitikes" of the Buddhists. (6) The "Three Vedas" of the Hindûs. (7) "Zendavesta" of the Persians.

Seven Sleepers, The. The tale of these sleepers is told in divers manners. The best accounts are those in the "Korân"; "The Golden Legends," by Jacques de Voragine; the "De Gloria Martyrum," by Gregory of Tours; and the "Oriental Tales," by Caylus. According to one version they were seven noble youths of Ephesus, who fled in the Decian persecution to a cave in Mount Celion, the mouth of which was blocked up by stones. After 230 years they were discovered, and awoke, but died within a few days, and were taken in a large stone coffin to Marseilles. Another tradition is, that Edward the Confessor, in his mind's eye, saw the seven sleepers turn from their right sides to their left, and whenever they turn on their sides it indicates great disasters to Christendom. This idea was introduced by Tennyson in his poem, "Harold."

Seven Wise Masters is the title of a mediæval collection of novels, important both from its contents and its wide-spread popularity. The work is undoubtedly of Oriental origin, yet neither the period when it was composed, nor how far it spread through the East, is known, but it existed in Arabic as a translation from Indian sources before the Eleventh Century. The work became known in literature, sometimes in a complete form, sometimes only particular novels were reproduced, under all sorts of names, in verse and in prose. Latin versions began to appear about the beginning of the Thirteenth Century and parts have been translated into English.

Seven Wise Men. The collective designation of a number of Greek sages, who lived about 620-548 B. C., and devoted themselves to the cultivation of practical wisdom. Their moral and social experience was embodied in brief aphorisms, expressed in verse or in prose.

Sga'na'relle'. The hero of Molière's comedy "Le Mariage Forcé." He is represented as a humorist of about fifty-three, who having a mind to marry a fashionable young woman, but feeling a doubt, consults his friends upon this momentous question. Receiving no satisfactory counsel, and not much pleased with the proceedings of his bride elect, he at last determines to give up his engagement, but is cudgeled into compliance by the brother of his intended.

Shallow. A braggart and absurd country justice in Shakespeare's "Merry Wives of Windsor," and in the second part of "King Henry the Fourth."

Shalott', The Lady of. The heroine of Tennyson's poem of the same name. She weaves into her web all the sights reflected in the mirror which hangs opposite her window; but when Sir Lancelot passes, she leaves her mirror and looks out of the casement at the knight himself, whereupon a curse comes upon her. She entered a boat bearing her name on the prow, floated down the river to Camelot, and died heart broken on the way.

Shan'dy, Mrs. The mother of Tristram Shandy in Sterne's novel of this name. She is the ideal of nonentity, a character individual from its very absence of individuality.

Shan'dy, Tristram. The nominal hero of Sterne's "The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy, Gent."

Shan'dy, Walter. The name of Tristram Shandy's father in Sterne's novel of this name, a man of an active and metaphysical, but at the same time a whimsical, cast of mind, whom too much and too miscellaneous learning had brought within a step or two of madness. The romance, "Tristram Shandy," is not built on a regular plot. The hero has no adventures, and the story consists of a series of episodes which introduce the reader to the home-life of an English country family. This family is one of the most amusing.

Sharp, Rebecca. The prominent character in Thackeray's "Vanity Fair," the daughter of a poor painter, dashing, selfish, unprincipled, and very clever, who manages to marry Rawdon Crawley, afterwards his excellency Colonel Crawley, C. B. He was disinherited on account of his marriage with Becky, then a poor governess, but she taught him how to live in splendor on no income. Lord Steyne introduced her to court, but her conduct with this peer gave rise to scandal, which caused a separation between her and Rawdon. She joins her fortunes with Joseph Sedley, a wealthy "collector," of Boggley Wollah, in India. Having insured his life and lost his money, he dies suddenly under very suspicious circumstances. Becky at last assumes the character of a pious, charitable Lady Bountiful, given to all good works.

Shepherdess, The Faithful. A pastoral drama by John Fletcher. The "faithful shepherdess" is Corin, who remains faithful to her lover although dead. Milton has borrowed from this pastoral in his "Comus."

Shepherd of Banbury. The ostensible author of a work entitled "The Shepherd of Banbury's Rules to judge of the Changes of Weather, grounded on Forty Years' Experience, etc.," a work of great popularity among the English poor.

Shepherd of Salisbury Plain, The. The hero and title of a religious tract by Hannah More. The shepherd is noted for his homely wisdom and simple piety.

Shepherd's Pipe. Pan, in Greek mythology, was the god of forests, pastures, and flocks, and was the attributed inventor of the shepherd's flute or pipe, a series of graduated tubes set together (open at one end and closed at the other), played by blowing across the open ends.

Shepherd's Calendar, The. Twelve eclogues in various metres, by Spenser, one for each month. January: Colin Clout (Spenser), bewails that Rosalind does not return his love. February: Cuddy, a lad, complains of the cold, and Thenot laments the degeneracy of pastoral life. March: Willie and Thomalin discourse of love. April: Hobbinal sings a song on Eliza. May: Palinode exhorts Piers to join the festivities of May, but Piers replies that good shepherds who seek their own indulgence expose their flocks to the wolves. June: Hobbinal exhorts Colin to greater cheerfulness. July: Morrel, a goat-herd, invites Thomalin to come with him to the uplands. August: Perigot and Willie contend in song, and Cuddy is appointed arbiter. September: Diggon Davie complains to Hobbinal of clerical abuses. October: On poetry. November: Colin, being asked by Thenot to sing, excuses himself because of his grief for Dido, but finally sings her elegy. December: Colin again complains that his heart is desolate. Thenot is an old shepherd bent with age, who tells Cuddy, the herdsman's boy, the fable of the oak and the briar, one of the best-known fables included in the calendar.

Sheridan's Ride. A lyric by T. B. Read, one of the few things written during the heat of the Civil War that is likely to survive.

She Stoops to Conquer. This well-known comedy by Oliver Goldsmith is said to have been founded on an incident which actually occurred to its author. When Goldsmith was sixteen years of age, a wag residing at Ardagh directed him, when passing through that village, to Squire Fetherstone's house as the village inn. The mistake was not discovered for some time, but all concerned enjoyed the joke. "She Stoops to Conquer" is one of the gayest, pleasantest, and most amusing pieces of English comedy.

Shin'gebis. In Longfellow's "Hiawatha," the diver who challenged the North Wind and put him to flight in combat.

Shocky. The Hoosier School-master, Edw. Eggleston. The little lad from the poorhouse who adores the schoolmaster and early warns him of plans for upsetting his authority. He is also a small poet, not in rhyming, but in comprehension of things about him and in his way of looking at life, and he grows to be a helper in the "Church of the Best Licks," founded by the school-master. He is brother to Hannah whom the master loves. Shocky and Hannah and their companions in the story bring the speech and life of their people and their time into American literature.

Shy'lock. A sordid, avaricious, revengeful Jew, in Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice."

Siege Perilous, The. The Round Table contained sieges or seats in the names of different knights. One was reserved for him who was destined to achieve the quest of the holy graal. This seat was called "perilous," because if any one sat therein except he for whom it was reserved it would be his death. This seat finally bore the name of Sir Galahad.

Siegfried. The hero of various Scandinavian and Teutonic legends, particularly of the old German epic poem, the "Nibelungen Lied." He is represented as a young warrior of physical strength and beauty, and in valor superior to all men of his time. He cannot easily be identified with any historical personage.

Sikes, Bill. A brutal thief and housebreaker in Dickens's novel "Oliver Twist." He murders his mistress, Nancy, and in trying to lower himself by a rope from the roof of a building where he had taken refuge from the crowd, he falls and is choked in a noose of his own making. Sikes had an ill-conditioned savage dog, the beast-image of his master, which he kicked and loved, ill-treated and fondled.

Silken Thread. Gulliver's Travels. In the kingdom of Lilliput, the three great prizes of honor are "fine silk threads six inches long, one blue, another red, and a third green." The thread is girt about the loins, and no ribbon of the Legion of Honor, or Knight of the Garter, is won more worthily or worn more proudly.

Sind'bad the Sailor. A character in the "Arabian Nights," in which is related the story of his strange voyages and wonderful adventures.

Si'non. In Virgil's "Æneid" the cunning Greek, who, by a false tale, induced the Trojans to drag the Wooden Horse into Troy.

Sleeping Beauty. The heroine of a celebrated nursery tale which relates how a princess was shut up by fairy enchantment, to sleep a hundred years in a castle, around which sprung up a dense, impenetrable wood. At the expiration of the appointed time, she was delivered from her imprisonment and her trance by a gallant young prince, before whom the forest opened itself to afford him passage. Grimm derives this popular and widely diffused tale from the old northern mythology.

Slender. A silly youth in Shakespeare's "Merry Wives of Windsor," who is an unsuccessful suitor for the hand of "Sweet Anne Page."

Slick, Sam. The title and hero of various humorous narratives, illustrating and exaggerating the peculiarities of the Yankee character and dialect written by Judge Thomas C. Haliburton. Sam Slick is represented as a Yankee clockmaker and peddler, full of quaint drollery, unsophisticated wit, knowledge of human nature, and aptitude in the use of what he calls "soft sawder."

Slop, Dr. The name of a choleric and uncharitable physician in Sterne's novel, "The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy, Gent."

Slough of Despond. Pilgrim's Progress, Bunyan. A deep bog, which Christian had to pass on his way to the Wicket Gate. Neighbor Pliable would not attempt to pass it, and turned back. While Christian was floundering in the slough, Help came to his aid, and assisted him over.

Sly, Christopher. Taming of the Shrew, Shakespeare. A keeper of bears and a tinker, son of a pedlar, and a sad drinker.

Song of Roland. An ancient song recounting the deeds of Roland, the renowned nephew of Charlemagne, slain in the pass of Roncesvalles. At the battle of Hastings, Taillefer advanced on horseback before the invading army, and gave the signal for onset by singing this famous song. (See Roland.)

Songs of the Sierras. A collection of poems by Joaquin Miller, which made him known on two continents within a year of their publication. The title explains the chief subject of the songs.

Spectator, The. A periodical famous in literature in which most of the articles were written by Addison or Sir Richard Steele. The first number was published in London in the year 1711, the last, No. 635, was issued in December, 1714. The most noted of Addison's writings is said to be the series of sketches in "The Spectator," of which Sir Roger de Coverley is the central figure, and Sir Andrew Freeport and Will Honeycomb the side ones. Sir Roger himself is an absolute creation; the gentle yet vivid imagination, the gay spirit of humor and the keen shrewd observation mark it a work of pure genius. In this Addison has given a delicacy to English sentiment, and a modesty to English wit which it never knew before. Dr. Johnson says, "to attain an English style, familiar but not coarse, and elegant, but not ostentatious, one must give his days and nights to the volumes of Addison."

Sphinx. A Greek word, applied to certain symbolical forms of Egyptian origin. The most remarkable Sphinx is the Great Sphinx at Gizeh, a colossal form, hewn out of the natural rock. Immediately in front of the breast is a small naos, or chapel, formed of three hieroglyphical tablets. Votive inscriptions of the Roman period, some as late as the Third Century, were discovered in the walls and constructions. On the second digit of the left claw of the Sphinx, an inscription, in pentameter Greek verses, by Arrian, was discovered. Another metrical and prosaic inscription was also found. In Assyria and Babylonia, representations of Sphinxes have been found, and the same are not uncommon on Phenician works of art.

Squeers. Name of a family prominent in Dickens's "Nicholas Nickleby." Wackford Squeers, master of Dotheboy's Hall, Yorkshire, a vulgar, conceited, ignorant schoolmaster, overbearing and mean. He steals the boys' pocket money, clothes his son in their best suits, half starves them, and teaches them next to nothing. Ultimately he is transported for theft. Mrs. Squeers, a raw-boned, harsh, heartless virago, with no womanly feeling for the boys put under her charge. Miss Fanny Squeers, daughter of the schoolmaster. Miss Fanny falls in love with Nicholas Nickleby, but later hates him because he is insensible to the soft impeachment. Master Wackford Squeers, overbearing, self-willed and passionate. The picture of this family and their ways had great influence on the schools of England, by rousing the people to a knowledge of their management.

Squire of Dames. A personage introduced by Spenser in the "Faerie Queen," and whose curious adventures are there recorded. It is often used to express a person devoted to the fair sex.

Steer'forth. David Copperfield, Dickens. The young man who led little Em'ly astray. When tired of his toy, he proposed to her to marry his valet. Steerforth being shipwrecked off the coast of Yarmouth, Ham Peggotty tried to rescue him, but both were drowned.

Sten'tor. A Grecian herald in the Trojan War, whom Homer describes as "great-hearted, brazen-voiced Sten'tor, accustomed to shout as loud as fifty other men."

Steph'a-no. (1) A drunken butler, in Shakespeare's "Tempest." (2) A servant to Portia, in Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice."

Stig'gins, Rev., Mr. A red-nosed, hypocritical "shepherd," or Methodist parson, in Dickens's "Pickwick Papers," with a great appetite for pineapple rum. He is the spiritual adviser of Mrs. Weller, and lectures on temperance.

Stone of Sar'dis. The Great Stone of Sardis, Stockton. In this stone the imaginary science of the future is joined to the actual science of to-day in an extremely plausible way. The North Pole is visited by a submarine vessel, a light is found capable of penetrating for miles into the interior of the earth, and finally the center of that earth is discovered to be an enormous diamond.

Storm-and-stress Period. In the literary history of Germany, the name given to a period of great intellectual convulsion, when the nation began to assert its freedom from the fetters of an artificial literary spirit. The period derives its name from a drama of Klinger (1753-1831), whose high-wrought tragedies and novels reflect the excitement of the time.

Sur'name. The overname; either the name written over the Christian name, or given over and above it; an additional name. For a long time persons had no family name, but only one, and that a personal name. Plato recommended parents to give happy names to their children; and the Pythagoreans taught that the minds, actions, and successes of men were according to their names, genius, and fate. The popes changed their names at their exaltation to the pontificate, "a custom introduced by Pope Sergius." In France it was usual to change the name given at baptism, as was done in the case of two sons of Henry II. of France. They were christened Alexander and Hercules; but at their confirmation, these names were changed to Henry and Francis. It is usual for the religious at their entrance into monasteries to assume new names, to show they are about to lead a new life.

Swallow Barn. The three novels, "Swallow Barn," "Horse-Shoe Robinson," and "Rob of the Bowl," besides their value as works of art, are all careful historical studies giving admirable pictures of life in the Southern States in the earlier days of the republic. They were written by John P. Kennedy, who is quoted in literature as next after Cooper among American novelists.

Swiv'el-ler, Dick. A careless, light-headed fellow in Dickens's novel of the "Old Curiosity Shop," whose flowery orations and absurdities of quotation provoke laughter, but whose real kindness of heart enlists sympathy.

Tab'ard. The name of the Inn at Southwark where the pilgrims in Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" assembled. It took its name from its sign, a tabard, or herald's jacket.

Tales of a Wayside Inn. Name given by Longfellow to a collection of short poems arranged by himself and collected together much in the same form as Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales." These "tales" were mostly gathered from old literatures and translated into Longfellow's own verse, only one, "The Birds of Killingworth," is said to be entirely original. Seven narrators are represented: the Landlord, the Student, the Spanish Cavalier, the Jew, the Sicilian, the Musician, and the Theologian. Four colonial tales are included in the work. "Paul Revere's Ride," "Elizabeth," "Lady Wentworth," and "The Rhyme of Sir Christopher."

Tal'mud is a Hebrew word meaning doctrine. It is the name applied to a work containing traditions respecting the usages and laws of the Jewish people. The law, among that people, was divided into the written and the unwritten. The written law embraced the five books of Moses; the unwritten was handed down orally; the oral being, in fact, explanatory of the written. But, in time, the oral came, also, to be put in writing, and formed the text of the Talmud. This was first done, it is believed, about the year 200. There are two separate commentaries on this text, which are distinguished as the Babylonian and the Jerusalem. The Talmud of Jerusalem consists of two parts, the "Mishna" and the "Gemara." The "Mishna" is more correct than the "Gemara," which is filled with dreams and foolish disputations. The Talmud of Babylon, which is of higher authority among the Jews than that of Jerusalem, was composed by Rabbi Aser, who lived near Babylon; he did not live to finish it, but it was completed by his disciples about 500 years after Christ.

Tam O'Shanter. The title of a poem by Burns. and the name of its hero, a farmer, who, riding home very late and very drunk from Ayr, in a stormy night, had to pass by the kirk of Alloway, a place reputed to be a favorite haunt of the Devil and his friends and emissaries. On approaching the kirk, he perceived a light gleaming through the windows; but having got courageously drunk, he ventured on till he could look into the edifice, when he saw a dance of witches. His presence became known and, in an instant all was dark, and Tam, recollecting himself, turned and spurred his horse to the top of her speed, chased by the whole fiendish crew. It is a current belief that witches, or any evil spirits, have no power to follow a poor wight any farther than the middle of the next running stream. Fortunately for Tam, the River Doon was near and Tam escaped while the witches held only the tail of his mare, Maggie. It has been said of "Tam O'Shanter" that in no other poem of the same length can there be found so much brilliant description, pathos, and quaint humor, nor such a combination of the terrific and the ludicrous.

Te Deum. A well-known hymn (so called from its first words) of the Roman Catholic Church, sung on all occasions of triumph and thanksgiving, and a theme upon which the most celebrated composers have exercised their musical genius. The hymn is one of the most simple and at the same time the most solemn and majestic in the whole range of the hymnology of the Roman Catholic Church. Its authorship is uncertain.

Tann'hauser. A famous legendary hero of Germany, and the subject of an ancient ballad of the same name. The noble Tannhäuser is a knight devoted to valorous adventures and to beautiful women. In Mantua, he wins the affection of a lovely lady, Lisaura, and of a learned philosopher, Hilario, with whom he converses frequently upon supernatural subjects. Enchanted by marvelous tales, he wishes for nothing less than to participate in the love of some beauteous elementary spirit, who shall, for his sake, assume the form of mortal woman. Hilario promises to grant even more than he has wished, if he will have courage to venture upon the Venusberg. Tannhäuser ascends the mountain and, hearing of his departure, Lisaura dies. Tannhäuser stays long on the enchanting mountain, but at last, moved to repentance, he obtains permission to depart. He hastens to Mantua, weeps over the grave of Lisaura, and thence proceeds to Rome, where he makes public confession of his sins to Pope Urban. The pope refuses him absolution, saying he can no more be pardoned than the dry wand which he holds can bud and bear green leaves. Tannhäuser, flees from Rome, and vainly seeks his former preceptor, Hilario. Venus appears before him, and, lures him back to the mountain, there to remain until the day of judgment. Meanwhile, at Rome the dry wand bears leaves. Urban, alarmed at this miracle, sends messengers in search of the unhappy knight; but he is nowhere to be found. This Tannhäuser legend is very popular in Germany, and is often alluded to by German writers. Tieck has made it the subject of a narrative, and Wagner of an opera which has gained great celebrity.

Tar-tuffe'. A common nick-name for a hypocritical pretender to religion. It is derived from a celebrated comedy of the same name by Molière, in which the hero, a hypocritical priest, is so called.

Tea'zle, Lady. The heroine of Sheridan's comedy, "The School for Scandal," and the wife of Sir Peter Teazle, an old gentleman who marries late in life. She is represented as being "a lively and innocent, though imprudent, country girl, transplanted into the midst of all that can bewilder and endanger her, but with enough of purity about her to keep the blight of the world from settling upon her."

Tea'zle, Sir Peter. A character in Sheridan's play, "The School for Scandal," husband of Lady Teazle.

Tempest, The. This has been called one of Shakespeare's fairy plays. The story of it runs: Prospero, Duke of Milan, was dethroned by his brother Antonio, and left on the open sea with his three-year old daughter, Miranda, in "a rotten carcass of a boat." In this they were carried to an enchanted island, uninhabited except by a hideous creature, Caliban, the son of a witch. Prospero was a powerful enchanter, and soon had not only Caliban, but all the spirits of the region under his control, including Ariel, chief of the spirits of the air. Years afterward Antonio, Alfonso, Sebastian and other friends of the usurper came near the island. Prospero, by his magic, raises a storm which casts their ship on the shore and the whole party are spell-bound and brought to Prospero. Plots and counter-plots follow, bringing in Caliban and clowns, but all are made ridiculous and defeated by Prospero and Ariel.

Ten'son. A kind of poem among the troubadours which carries on a contention or dispute, apparently serious, and often concerning love. The tenson was usually recited by two persons in alternating stanzas. The greater number of these are found in early Italian and French literature.

Ten Times One. A writing in story form by E. E. Hale. It is said that the inspiration of this story led to the founding of the "King's Daughters" Society.

Thaddeus of Warsaw. The hero and title of a novel by Jane Porter.

Thang'brand. Tales of a Wayside Inn, H. W. Longfellow. King Olaf's drunken priest, "short of stature and large of limb," who was sent to Iceland, found the people poring over their books, and sailed back to Norway to say to Olaf that there was "little hope of those Iceland men."

Thek'la. The daughter of Wallenstein, in Schiller's drama of this name. She is an invention of the poet.

Theodo'rus. The name of a physician, in Rabelais's romance of "Gargantua." At the request of Ponocrates, Gargantua's tutor, he undertook to cure the latter of his vicious manner of living, and accordingly purged him canonically with Anticyrian hellebore, by which medicine he cleared out all the foulness and perverse habit of his brain, so that he became a man of great honor, sense, courage, and piety.

Thorberg Skaffing. Tales of a Wayside Inn. H. W. Longfellow. The master-builder ordered by King Olaf to build a ship twice as long and twice as large as the "Dragon" built by Rand the Strong, which was stranded. Thorberg built the ship, watching his workmen closely, and when she was ready for launching King Olaf and the workmen were amazed to see every plank down her sides cut with deep gashes and more amazed to find that Thorberg had done the deed. From these gashes he then chipped and smoothed the sides, to the delight of all; she was christened the "Long Serpent" and the name of her builder recited in the Saga.

Thorpe, Harry. The Blazed Trail. S. E. White. The hero of the novel a vigorous young man, who, as a "land-looker," finds and takes up a valuable timber tract, against the crafty old corporation which seeks first to steal the timber, then to forestall him in buying it, and finally to ruin him. The true romance of the story is that of the forest and the titanic struggle of man against nature and against man.

Three Kings, Feast of the. A famous mediæval festival, identical with Epiphany. But the name is more particularly given to a kind of dramatic or spectacular representation of the incidents recorded in the second chapter of Matthew — as, the appearance of the wise men in splendid pomp at the court of Herod, the miraculous star, the manger at Bethlehem, the solemn and costly worship of the Babe — which was long very popular.

Three Kings of Cologne, The. The three "Wise Men" who followed the guiding star "from the East" to Jerusalem, and offered gifts to the babe Jesus.

Thunderer, The. Name popularly given to the English newspaper, the "London Times." The accepted version of the way in which the great journal got its name of "The Thunderer," is that Captain Sterling, one of the "staff," once wrote a sort of apology in reference to a mistaken assertion and used the phrase "We thundered out." This caught the public fancy, hence the name. Captain Sterling was a well-known figure in London political circles and was father of the more famous John Sterling, critic, essayist, and friend of Wordsworth, Coleridge, and De Quincey.

Thyrsis. Corydon and Thyrsis are favorite names given to shepherds by writers of pastoral poetry. So also, Phyllis and Thestylis are names often applied to rustic maidens or shepherdesses.

Tibbs or Tibs. A character in Goldsmith's "Citizen of the World," quoted as a "most useful hand." He will write you a receipt for the bite of a mad dog, tell you an Eastern tale to perfection, and understands the business part of an author so well that no publisher can humbug him.

Tigg, Mon'tague. Martin Chuzzlewit. Dickens. A clever impostor, who lives by his wits. He starts a bubble insurance office and makes considerable gain thereby. Having discovered the attempt of Jonas Chuzzlewit to murder his father, he compels him to put his money in the "new company," but Jones afterwards murders him.

Ti'mon. Timon of Athens. Shakespeare. The drama begins with the joyous life of Timon, and his hospitable extravagance, launches into his pecuniary embarrassment, and the discovery that his "professed friends" will not help him, and ends with his flight into the woods, his misanthropy, and his death. Introduced into the play is "Timon's Banquet." Being shunned by his friends in adversity, he pretended to have recovered his money, and invited his false friends to a banquet. The table was laden with covers, but when the contents were exposed, nothing was provided but lukewarm water.

Ti'ny Tim. Christmas Stories. Dickens. A striking character, the little son of Bob Cratchett, whose family were made happier by gifts from the converted Scrooge. (See Scrooge.)

Tirzah'. Ben Hur. General Lew Wallace. A beautiful Jewish maiden, sister of Ben Hur. Their father had been a prince of Jerusalem, and died leaving a large estate. At the age of fifteen, Tirzah, with her mother, was imprisoned through the cruelty of Messala who coveted their property. They both became lepers and when released from prison were forced to live among the outcasts. They were healed by Jesus, Ben Hur, himself, witnessing the miracle. As soon as the change in their look had taken place he recognized them, and when the Jewish statutes had been complied with, Tirzah and her mother were united with their brother in their former home.

Tippecanoe'. Name given to William Henry Harrison during the political canvass which preceded his election, on account of the victory gained by him over the Indians in the battle which took place on the 6th of November, 1811, at the junction of the Tippecanoe and Wabash rivers.

Toby, Uncle. A character in Sterne's "Tristram Shandy." A captain who was wounded at the siege of Namur, and was obliged to retire from the service. He is the impersonation of kindness, benevolence, and simple-heartedness; his courage is undoubted, his gallantry delightful for its innocence and modesty.

Token, The. A collection of original articles, prose and poetry, by various contributors, issued first in the year 1824. This was the first "annual" that appeared in our country; it became popular and was continued for fifteen years under the supervision of "Peter Parley."

Tom, Dick, and Harry. An appellation very commonly employed to designate a crowd or rabble.

Tommy At'kins. Barrack-room Ballads. Kipling. The name is here used in its general meaning, a British soldier. The name came from the little pocket ledgers served out, at one time, to all British soldiers. In these manuals were to be entered the name, the age, the date of enlistment, etc. The War Office sent with each little book a form for filling it in, and the hypothetical name selected was "Tommy Atkins." The books were instantly so called, and it did not require many days to transfer the name from the book to the soldier.

Tom Saw'yer. Adventures of Tom Sawyer. Mark Twain. An "elastic" youth whose performances delight both old and young readers. Queer enterprises influenced by the old superstitions among slaves and children in the Western States give reliable pictures of boy-life in the middle of the Nineteenth Century.

Tom the Piper. One of the characters in the ancient Morris dance, represented with a tabour, tabourstick, and pipe. He carried a sword and shield, to denote his rank.

Tom Thumb. In legendary history a dwarf no larger than a man's thumb. He lived in the reign of King Arthur, by whom he was knighted. He was killed by the poisonous breath of a spider in the reign of the successor of King Arthur. Amongst his adventures it is told that he was lying one day asleep in a meadow, when a cow swallowed him as she cropped the grass. At another time, he rode in the ear of a horse. He crept up the sleeve of a giant, and so tickled him that he shook his sleeve, and Tom, falling into the sea, was swallowed by a fish. The fish being caught and carried to the palace, gave the little man his introduction to the king. The oldest version of this nursery tale is in rhyme.

To'nio. Daughter of the Regiment. Donizetti. The name of the youth who saved Maria, the sutler-girl from falling down a precipice. The two fall in love with each other, and the regiment consents to their marriage, provided Tonio will enlist under its flag. No sooner is this done than the marchioness of Berkenfield lays claim to Maria as her daughter, and removes her to the castle. In time, the castle is besieged and taken by the very regiment into which Tonio had enlisted, and, as Tonio had risen to the rank of a French officer, the marchioness consents to his marriage with her daughter.

Top'sy. Uncle Tom's Cabin. Mrs. Stowe. A young slave-girl, who never knew whether she had either father or mother, and being asked by Miss Ophelia St. Clare how she supposed she came into the world, replied, "I spects I growed." Topsy illustrates the ignorance, low moral development, and wild humor of the African character, as well as its capacity for education.

Touchstone. A clown in Shakespeare's "As You Like It."

Townley Mysteries. Certain religious dramas; so called because the MS. containing them belonged to P. Townley. These dramas are supposed to have been acted at Widkirk Abbey, in Yorkshire.

Trad'dles. David Copperfield. Dickens. A simple, honest young man, who believes in everybody and everything and who is never depressed by his want of success. He had the habit of brushing his hair up on end, which gave him a look of surprise. Traddles was generally accompanied by "the dearest girl" and her numerous sisters.

Tragedy and Comedy. The earliest regular tragedy written in English was the play of "Gorboduc" by Thomas Sackville. This was acted in the year 1562. The first English comedy was "Ralph Royster Doyster," acted in 1551, and written by Nicholas Udall.

Triads. Three subjects more or less connected formed into one continuous poem or subject: thus the "Creation, Redemption, and Resurrection" would form a triad. The conquest of England by the Romans, Saxons, and Normans would form a triad. The Welsh triads, known in literature, are collections of historic facts, mythological traditions, moral maxims, or rules of poetry disposed in groups of three.

Trim, Corporal. Uncle Toby's attendant, in Sterne's novel, "The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy, Gent.," distinguished for his fidelity and affection, his respectfulness, and his volubility.

Tris'tram, Sir. One of the most celebrated heroes of mediæval romance. His adventures form an episode in the history of Arthur's Court, and are related by Thomas the Rhymer, as well as by many romancists.

Trot'wood, Betsey. David Copperfield, Dickens. A great-aunt to David whose daily trial seemed to be donkeys. A dozen times a day would she rush on the green before her house to drive off the donkeys and donkey-boys. She was a most kind-hearted woman, who concealed her tenderness under a snappish manner. Miss Betsey was the true friend of David Copperfield.

Troubadours were minstrels of Southern France in the Eleventh, Twelfth, and Thirteenth Centuries. They were the first to discard Latin and use the native tongue in their compositions. Their poetry was either about love and gallantry, or war and chivalry. In Northern France they were called Trouvères and the language employed was the Walloon. The troubadours were held in high esteem by the Court in England. They furnished literature for the readers, and so wielded potent influence over English thought and language.

Trovato're. Il Trovatore, Verdi. This opera is founded on a drama belonging to the Fifteenth Century. The story is that Trovatore, or the Troubadour, is Manrico, the supposed son of a gypsy but really a brother to the count. The princess Leonora falls in love with the troubadour, but the count is about to put Manrico to death, when Leonora intercedes on his behalf, and promises to give herself to him if he will spare her lover. The count consents; but while he goes to release his captive, Leonora kills herself by sucking poison from a ring. When Manrico discovers this sad calamity, he dies also.

Tuck, Friar. Ivanhoe, Scott. The father-confessor of Robin Hood and connected with Fountain's Abbey. He is represented as a clerical Falstaff, very fat and self-indulgent, very humorous, and somewhat coarse. His dress was a russet habit of the Franciscan order. He was sometimes girt with a rope of rushes. Friar Tuck also appears in the "Morris dance" on May-day.

Tur'vey-drop. Bleak House, Dickens. A conceited dancing-master, who imposes on the world by his majestic appearance and elaborate toilette. He is represented as living upon the earnings of his son, who has a most slavish reverence for him as a perfect "master of deportment."

Twelfth Night, a drama by Shakespere. The story is said to have come from a novelette written early in the Sixteenth Century. A brother and sister, twins, are shipwrecked. Viola dressed like her brother becomes page to the duke Orisino. The duke was in love with Olivia, and as the lady looked coldly on his suit, he sent Viola to advance it, but the wilful Olivia, instead of melting towards the duke, fell in love with his beautiful page. Sebastian, the twin-brother of Viola, was attacked in a street brawl before Olivia and thinking him to be the page she invited him in. The result was the marriage of Sebastian to Olivia and the duke to Viola.

Twice-Told Tales. This name was given by the author, Nathaniel Hawthorne, to the tales included under its title, because some of them had been already published in the "Token," and other periodicals. They are mystical and though in prose form are the work of a poet. The tales are nearly all American in subject but treated from the spiritual rather than the practical side.

Two Gentlemen of Vero'na, a drama by Shakespere, the story of which is taken from the "Diana" of Montemayor (Sixteenth Century). The plot resembles that of Twelfth Night, as Julia, disguised as a page, is a prominent figure.

Ubal'do. Jerusalem Delivered, Tasso. One of the older crusaders, who had visited many regions. He and Charles the Dane went to bring back Rinaldo from the enchanted castle.

Ube'da. Don Quixote, Cervantes. A noted artist who one day painted a picture, but was obliged to write under it, "This is a cock," in order that the spectator might know what was intended to be represented.

U'lin. Tales of the Genii, Ridley. An enchantress, who had no power over those who remained faithful to Allah and their duty; but if any fell into error or sin, she had full power to do as she liked. Thus, when Misnar (Sultan of India) mistrusted the protection of Allah, she transformed him into a toad.

Ul-ri'ca. A hideous old sibyl in Sir Walter Scott's "Ivanhoe."

Ul'tima Thule. The extremity of the world; the most northern point known to the ancient Romans. Pliny and others say it is Iceland.

Una. Faerie Queen, Spenser. The personification of truth. She goes, leading a lamb and riding on a white ass, to the court of Gloriana, to crave that one of her knights might undertake to slay the dragon which kept her father and mother prisoners. The adventure is accorded to the Red Cross Knight. Being driven by a storm into "Wandering Wood," a vision is sent to the knight, which causes him to leave Una and she goes in search of him. In her wanderings a lion becomes her attendant. After many adventures, she finds St. George, "the Red Cross Knight," but he is severely wounded. Una takes him to the house of Holiness, where he is carefully nursed, and then leads him to Eden.

Uncle Tom. Uncle Tom's Cabin, Stowe, Mrs. A negro slave of unaffected piety, and most faithful in the discharge of all his duties. His master, a humane man, becomes embarrassed in his affairs, and sells him to a slave-dealer. After passing through various hands, and suffering intolerable cruelties, he dies.

Underground Railroad, The. A popular embodiment of the various ways in which fugitive slaves from the Southern States of the American Union were assisted in escaping to the North, or to Canada; often humorously abbreviated U. G. R. R.

Un'dine. In French fable a water-nymph, who was exchanged for the young child of a fisherman living near an enchanted forest. One day, Sir Huldbrand took shelter in the fisherman's hut, fell in love with Undine, and married her. By marrying a mortal she obtained a soul, and with it all the pains and penalties of the human race.

Ur'gan. Lady of the Lake, Scott. A human child stolen by the king of the fairies, and brought up in elf-land. He said to Alice Brand (the wife of Lord Richard), "if any woman will sign my brow thrice with a cross, I shall resume my proper form." Alice signed him thrice, and Urgan became at once "the fairest knight in all Scotland," and Alice recognized in him her own brother Ethert.

Urgan'da. In the romance of "Amadis de Gaul," a powerful fairy sometimes appearing in all the terrors of an evil enchantress.

U'ther. Son of Constans, one of the fabulous or legendary kings of Britain, and the father of Arthur.

Utopia. The name of an imaginary island described in the celebrated work of Sir Thomas More, in which was found the utmost perfection in laws, politics, and social arrangements. More's romance obtained a wide popularity, and the epithet "Utopian" has since been applied to all schemes for the improvement of society which are deemed not practicable.

Val'en-tine. (1) One of the heroes in the old romance of "Valentine and Orson," which is of uncertain age and authorship. (2) One of the "Two Gentlemen of Verona," in Shakespere's play of that name. (3) A gentleman attending on the Duke in Shakespere's "Twelfth Night." (4) One of the characters in Goethe's "Faust." He is a brother of Margaret.

Vale'rian or Vali'rian. Canterbury Tales, Chaucer. The husband of St. Cecilia. Cecilia told him she was beloved by an angel, who constantly visited her; and Valirian requested to see this visitant. Cecilia replied that he should do so, if he went to Pope Urban to be baptized. This he did, and on returning home the angel gave him a crown of lilies, and to Cecilia a crown of roses, both from the garden of paradise.

Valley of Humiliation. Pilgrim's Progress, Bunyan. The place where Christian encountered Apollyon, just before he came to the "Valley of the Shadow of Death."

Van'ity Fair. Pilgrim's Progress, Bunyan. (1) A fair established by Beelzebub, Apollyon, and Legion, for the sale of all sorts of vanities. It was held in the town of Vanity, and lasted all the year round. Here were sold houses, lands, trades, honors, titles, kingdoms, and all sorts of pleasures and delights. Christian and Faithful had to pass through the fair, which they denounced. (2) Thackeray gave the name, "Vanity Fair," to the first of his famous works. It has been called "A novel without a hero." (See Sedley.)

Veck, Toby. The Chimes, Dickens. A ticket-porter who went on errands and bore the nickname Trotty. One New Year's Eve he had a nightmare and fancied he had mounted to the steeple of a neighboring church, and that goblins issued out of the bells. He was roused from his sleep by the sound of the bells ringing in the new year.

Veda. The technical name of those ancient Sanscrit works on which the first period of the religious belief of the Hindus is based.

Veiled Prophet. Lalla Rookh, Moore. He assumed to be a god, and maintained that he had been Adam, Noah, and other representative men. Having lost an eye, and being otherwise disfigured in battle, he wore a veil to conceal his face, but his followers said it was done to screen his dazzling brightness.

Ve'ni Crea'tor Spi'ritus. An ancient and very celebrated hymn of the Roman Breviary, which occurs in the offices of the Feast of Pentecost, and which is used in many of the most solemn services of the Roman Catholic Church. Its author is not known with certainty.

Ver'non, Die or Diana. Rob Roy, Scott. The heroine of the story, a high-born girl of great beauty and talents. She is an enthusiastic adherent to a persecuted religion and an exiled king. She is excluded from the ordinary wishes and schemes of other girls by being predestined to a hateful husband or a cloister, and by receiving a masculine education, under the superintendence of two men of talent and learning.

Version of the Scriptures. The common English version of the Scriptures, the most remarkable of Bible translations, was made by a company of forty-seven scholars who did their work at the request of King James I. The version was published in 1611. "Tyndale's translation of the New Testament is the most important philological monument of the first half of the Sixteenth Century, both as an historical relic, and as having more than anything else contributed to shape and fix the sacred dialect, and establish the form which the Bible must permanently assume in an English dress."

Vicar of Wakefield. The hero of Goldsmith's novel of the same name, Dr. Primrose, a simple-minded, pious clergyman, with six children. He begins life with a good fortune, a handsome house, and wealthy friends, but is reduced to poverty without any fault of his own, and, being reduced like Job, like Job he is restored. (See Primrose.)

Vin-cen'ti-o. The Duke of Vienna in Shakespeare's "Measure for Measure." He commits his scepter to Angelo, under the pretext of being called to take an urgent and distant journey, and by exchanging the royal purple for a monk's hood, observes incognito the condition of his people.

Vi'ola. Twelfth Night, Shakespere. A sister of Sebastian. They were twins, and so much alike that they could be distinguished only by their dress. When they were shipwrecked Viola was brought to shore by the captain, but her brother was left to shift for himself. Being in a strange land, Viola dressed as a page, and, under the name of Cesario, entered the service of Orsino, Duke of Illyria. The duke greatly liked his beautiful page, and, when he discovered her true sex, married her.

Violen'ta. All's Well that Ends Well, Shakespere. A character in the play who enters upon the scene only once and then she neither speaks nor is spoken to. The name has been used to designate any young lady nonentity; one who contributes nothing to the amusement or conversation of a party.

Vin'land. A name given, according to Snorro Sturleson, by Scandinavian voyagers, to a portion of the coast of North America discovered by them toward the close of the Tenth Century, well wooded, and producing agreeable fruits, particularly grapes. It is thought to have been some part of the coast of Massachusetts or Rhode Island.

Viv'ien or Viv'ian. Idylls of the King, Tennyson. She is also known as the Lady of the Lake, and according to early legends was of a high family. These legends tell that Merlin in his dotage, fell in love with her, and she imprisoned him in the forest of Britanny. She then persuaded Merlin to show her how a person could be imprisoned by enchantment without walls, towers, or chains, and after he had done so, she put him to sleep. While he slept, she performed the needful ceremonies, whereupon he found himself enclosed in a prison stronger than the strongest tower, and from that imprisonment was never again released.

Volapuk. This so-called universal language was invented in 1879, by Johann Martin Schleyer, a Swabian pastor and later a teacher in Constance. Of the vocabulary, about one-third is of English origin, while the Latin and Romance languages furnish a fourth. The grammar is simplified to the utmost.

Vulgate. Name given to a version of the Scriptures made in Latin, probably by St. Jerome, about the year 380. This version was authorized by the Council of Trent in the year 1546.

Walden. A record of the experiences of the author, Thoreau, while living near Walden Pond, on nine cents a day. He read Homer, watched the birds, bees, ants, and the animals that came within his range, describing the results of his acute powers of observation in a characteristic, quaint form.

Wa'verley. Name of hero and title of novel by Scott. Waverley was captain of "Waverley Honour" and after an injury he resigned his commission, and proposed to Flora M'Ivor, but was not accepted. Flora's brother, Fergus M'Ivor, introduced him to Prince Charles Edward. He entered the service of the Young Chevalier, and in the battle of Preston Pans saved the life of Colonel Talbot. The colonel, out of gratitude, obtained the pardon of young Waverley, who then married Rose Bradwardine, and settled down quietly in Waverley Honour. The novel, Waverley, was the first of Scott's historical novels, published in 1814. The materials are Highland feudalism, military bravery, and description of natural scenery. The chief characters are Charles Edward the Chevalier, the noble old baron of Bradwardine, the simple faithful clansman Evan Dhu, and the poor fool Davie Gellatley.

Waverley Novels. General name given to Scott's historical novels. Those founded on English history are "Ivanhoe," "Kenilworth," "Peveril of the Peak," "Betrothed," "Talisman," and "Woodstock." Founded on Scotch history are "Waverley," "Old Mortality," "Monastery," "The Abbott," "Legend of Montrose," "Fair Maid of Perth," and "Castle Dangerous." Treating of continental history are "Quentin Durward," "Anne of Geirstein," and "Count Robert of Paris." Twelve others in the series, including "Rob Roy," "Heart of Midlothian," "Bride of Lammermoor," are connected with historical events, but are more personal and deal mainly with Scottish character.

Weird Sisters, The. Three witches, in Shakespeare's tragedy of "Macbeth."

Weller, Samuel. In Dickens's celebrated "Pickwick Papers." A servant to Mr. Pickwick, to whom he becomes devotedly attached. Rather than leave his master, when he is sent to the Fleet, Sam Weller gets his father to arrest him for debt. He is an inimitable compound of wit, simplicity, quaint humor, and fidelity. "Tony Weller," father of Sam; a coachman of the old school, who drives between London and Dorking. On the coachbox he is a king, elsewhere a mere London "cabby." He marries a widow and his constant advice to his son is, "Sam, beware of the vidders." Everybody was merry over Mr. Pickwick and Sam Weller, and everybody was eager to read this entertaining author.

Westover Manuscripts. In the year 1728 Colonel Byrd set out with a party of commissioners to meet another party of commissioners from North Carolina, to survey and settle the boundary between North Carolina and Virginia. The other Virginia commissioners were Dandridge and Fitz-William. With them were two surveyors, a chaplain, and seventeen woodsmen and hunters. Colonel Byrd took notes of the journey. These important documents remained in manuscript until 1841, when they were printed under the title of "The Westover Manuscripts," being so called from the estate of Westover, on the north branch of the James River, where the author lived. These journals of Colonel Byrd are remarkable for the freshness and vividness of their descriptions, and for a continued undercurrent of good-natured humor. He is particularly fond of indulging in a bit of fun at the expense of the North Carolinians. The journals abound in stories illustrative of Natural History.

Whit'ting-ton, Dick. The hero of a famous old legend, in which he is represented as a poor orphan boy from the country, who went to London, where, after undergoing many hardships he obtained a penny and bought a cat. Shortly after, he sent his cat on a venture in his master's ship; and the King of Barbary, whose court was overrun with mice, gladly bought the cat at a high price. With this money Whittington commenced business, and succeeded so well that he finally married his former master's daughter, was knighted, and became lord mayor of London.

Wilfer. Name of a family prominent in "Our Mutual Friend," by Dickens. Reginald Wilfer, called by his wife R. W., and by his fellow-clerks Rumty. He was clerk in the drug-house of Chicksey, Stobbles, and Veneering. Mrs. Wilfer, wife of Mr. Reginald, a most majestic woman, with an exalted idea of her own importance. Bella Wilfer, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Wilfer, a wayward, playful, affectionate, spoilt beauty, so pretty, so womanly, and yet so childish that she was always captivating. She spoke of herself as "the lovely woman." Bella married John Harmon. Lavinia Wilfer, youngest sister of Bella, and called "The Irrepressible."

Winter's Tale, The. Shakespere (1604). Leontès, King of Sicily, invites his friend Polixenès to visit him, becomes jealous, and commands Camillo to poison him.

Camillo warns Polixenês, and flees with him to Bohemia. Leontês casts his queen, Hermionê, into prison, where she gives birth to a daughter. Hermionê is reported dead and the child is brought up by a shepherd, who calls it Perdita. Florizel sees Perdita and falls in love with her; but Polixenês, his father, tells her that she and the shepherd shall be put to death if she encourages the suit. Florizel and Perdita flee to Sicily, and being introduced to Leontês, it is soon discovered that Perdita is his lost daughter. Polixenês tracks his son to Sicily, and consents to the union. The party are invited to inspect a statue of Hermionê, and the statue turns out to be the living queen.

Worldly-Wiseman, Mr. One of the characters in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," who converses with Christian by the way, and endeavors to deter him from proceeding on his journey.

Wrayburn, Eugene. Our Mutual Friend, Dickens. Barrister-at-law; an indolent, moody, whimsical young man, who loves Lizzie Hexam. After he is nearly killed by Bradley Headstone, he reforms, and marries Lizzie, who saved his life.

Ya'hoo. A name given by Swift, in his satirical romance of "Gulliver's Travels," to one of a race of brutes having the form and all the vices of man. The Yahoos are represented as being subject to the Houyhnhnms, or horses endowed with reason.

Yamoyden. A romantic poem having for its hero Philip, the celebrated Sachem of the Pequod Indians. The author, Sands, published the poem between the years 1817 and 1819.

Yarpe. The Gray Horse Troop, Hamlin Garland. The resolute leader of the cowboy gang that undertook to drive the Tetongs from their reservation lands in the far West. The real hero of the story, Captain Curtis, is in charge, and his rational management of the Indians, his fight against the political ring that would defraud his wards, and his courageous handling of a serious crisis show him to be a different power from that these cowboys generally met, when they shot up towns and raced the Tetongs across the hills, making of themselves a lynching party on federal territory. United States soldiers appear on the scene and Yarpe and his men depart.

Yeast. A romance by Charles Kingsley, was the outcome of his interest in the Chartist Riots of that year, and gives some of the most powerful delineations of the sufferings of the poor which are to be found in English literature.

Yemassee. An historical tale founded on personal knowledge of the American Indian character. Written in the first half of the Nineteenth Century by Simms, of whom it has been said, "He has done for the historical traditions of the Carolinas what Cooper did for those of the North and West."

Ye'o. Westward Ho! Chas. Kingsley. A character in the novel prominent as a bold mariner, a true friend, a terrible foe. He was all his life a sailor, and made voyages to New Guinea for negro slaves which were sold in the West Indies. He joined in the search for fabulous wealth in New Spain, crossed the Isthmus of Panama, was pursued and wandered in the woods of the isthmus for some months. "Westward Ho!" is an historical novel, relating to Elizabethan English history.

Yor'ick. (1) The King of Denmark's jester, mentioned in Shakespeare's "Hamlet." Hamlet picks up his skull in the churchyard and apostrophizes it. (2) A humorous and careless parson in Sterne's "Tristram Shandy."

Yule Clog. The Yule clog is a great log of wood, sometimes the root of a tree, brought into the house with great ceremony on Christmas Eve, laid in the fireplace, and lighted with the brand of last year's clog. While it lasted, there was great drinking, singing, and telling of tales. Sometimes it was accompanied by Christmas candles, but in the cottages the only light was from the ruddy blaze of the great wood fire. The Yule clog was to burn all night; if it went out, it was considered a sign of ill luck.

Zano'ni. Hero of a novel so called by Lord Lytton. Zano'ni is supposed to possess the power of communicating with spirits, prolonging life, and producing gold, silver, and precious stones.

Zeno'bia. Blithedale Romance, Hawthorne. A strong-minded woman, beautiful and intelligent, who was interested in playing out the pastoral of the life at Brook Farm. She is represented as disappointed in love and at last she drowned herself.

Ze'phon. A "strong and subtle spirit" in Milton's "Paradise Lost," whom Gabriel dispatched with Ithuriel to find Satan.

Zo'phi-el. In Milton's "Paradise Lost," an angelic scout.

WILLIAM EWART GLADSTONE

BIOGRAPHY

Aaron, son of Amram and Jochebed, of the tribe of Levi, and the elder brother of Moses and Miriam. He appeared with Moses before Pharaoh, and was the first high priest of Israel, his sons being also consecrated to the priesthood. He shared the sin of Moses at Meribah, as well as its punishment, his death taking place shortly afterwards on Mount Hor.

Abbey, Edwin Austin, R. A., was born in 1852, and began his art studies at the Philadelphia Academy of the Fine Arts. He stands in the foremost rank of painters of historical and subject pictures. All his works show his fine decorative instinct, and are painted with a rich, glowing palette. They are remarkable for the correctness of all archæological detail. He has acquired great fame as an illustrator of Shakespere, whose plays have also supplied him with the subjects for some of his most successful pictures. Principal works: Richard III. and Lady Anne, King Lear's Daughters, Hamlet, the decorative panels illustrating the Quest of the Holy Grail, in the Boston Public Library, Coronation of King Edward VII., Columbus in the New World.

Abbot, Ezra, LL.D., D.D., born in 1819. American critic, very precocious as a child, graduated at Bowdoin College, and settled at Cambridge, gaining considerable reputation as a biblical critic. He contributed to periodicals, and also wrote several critical works, and in support of Unitarianism; the best known is that on "The Authority of the Fourth Gospel." Died, 1884.

Edited "Literary Record" of Harper's Magazine; associate editor "The Christian Union" with Henry Ward Beecher, whom he succeeded as pastor of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, May, 1888; resigned, November, 1898. Author: Jesus of Nazareth; Old Testament Shadows of New Testament Truth; A Layman's Story; How to Study the Bible; Illustrated Commentary on the New Testament; Dictionary of Religious Knowledge (with late T. J. Conant); A Study in Human Nature; In Aid of Faith; Life of Christ; Evolution of Christianity; The Theology of An Evolutionist; Christianity and Social Problems; Life and Letters of Paul; The Life that Really Is; Problems of Life; Life and Literature of the Ancient Hebrews; The Rights of Man; Henry Ward Beecher; The Other Room; The Great Companion; Christian Ministry; Personality of God; and Industrial Problems.

Abd-ul-Hamid II., formerly Sultan of Turkey, was born in 1842, the second son of Sultan Abd-ul-Medjid. He was proclaimed Sultan in succession to his brother Murad V., who was deposed in consequence of his mental incapacity (August 31, 1876), and died on August 29, 1904. The succession to the throne, according to Turkish custom, vests in the senior male descendant of the house of Othman, sprung from the Imperial Harem. The Sultan does not marry, but from the inmates of the Harem selects a certain number who are known as ladies of the palace, the others occupying positions subordinate to them. All children born in the Harem are held to be of legitimate and equal birth. The eldest son of the Sultan only succeeds when there are no uncles or cousins of greater age than himself. The Sultan has several children. He was forced to abdicate the throne in May, 1909.

Abelard, or Abailard (ab'-a-lard), Pierre, a French philosopher and ecclesiastic, was born in the year 1079, at Palais, near Nantes, in Brittany. He was celebrated for his learning and genius, and opened a school in Paris in 1103, where he taught philosophy with great success. His romantic love for Héloïse, and the misfortunes which followed in consequence of his unhappy passion, have added greatly to his celebrity. He died at the priory of St. Marcel, near Châlons, in 1142. He was at first interred by the monks of Cluni in their monastery, but his remains were afterwards removed to the Paraclete (a monastery in Champagne, which Abélard had himself founded, and which was then a convent presided over by Héloïse); and finally they were deposited, together with those of Héloïse, in the cemetery of Père la Chaise.

Abraham (ā'bra-ham), the progenitor of the Hebrew nation, descendant of Shem, born 1996 B. C., in Mesopotamia, died at the age of 175 years, and was buried in the Cave of Machpelah. Isaac and Ishmael were his sons by Sarah and Hagar, the latter being a slave.

Æschines, born 389 B. C., celebrated Athenian orator. Failing in an attack on Demosthenes, was twice sent on an embassy to Philip of Macedonia, and retired to Rhodes where he founded a school. Died, 314 B. C.

Æschylus (es'-ke-lus), an eminent Greek tragedian, born at Athens, 525 B. C. Of ninety tragedies which he wrote, fifty were crowned. Seven of them only remain; viz, "The Prometheus Bound," "The Seven Chiefs before Thebes," "The Persians," "Agamemnon," "The Choephora," "The Eumenides," and "The Suppliants." In his old age, Æschylus retired to the court of Hiero, King of Sicily. The oracle having predicted that the fall of a house should prove fatal to him, he went to reside in the fields, and was killed, it is said, by a tortoise which an eagle dropped upon his head. Died, 456 B. C.

Æsop (e'-sop). A celebrated fabulist, said to have been born at Phrygia, about 620 B. C. He was as deformed in body as accomplished in mind, and was originally a slave at Athens and at Samos. Having gained freedom by his wit, he traveled through Asia Minor and Egypt, and attached himself to the court of Cræsus, King of Lydia. Sent by that monarch upon an embassy to Delphos, he so offended the inhabitants by the keenness of his sarcasms, that they hurled him from a rock into the sea. He died about 564 B. C. His history appears to be altogether legendary.

Agassiz, Louis Johann Rudolph, born 1807; eminent naturalist, was the son of a Swiss Protestant clergyman. He studied medicine and graduated at Munich, but devoted himself principally to ichthyology, and was employed to classify and arrange the collection brought from Brazil by Martius and Spix. In 1846, he came to America, where he was well received, and accepted the chair of zoölogy and geology at the University of Cambridge (Harvard College). In 1865, he visited Brazil, and on his return placed the large collection he had made in the museum of Cambridge. He wrote numerous very valuable works, and was to the last a disbeliever in the Darwinian theory of evolution. Died, 1873.

Agricola (a-grick'-o-la), (Cneius Julius), a Roman governor of Britain under Vespasian, born A. D. 37. He subjected Scotland and Ireland; reduced the Britons; and, by his able government, preserved these territories to the Romans. Domitian, jealous of his success, recalled him; and Agricola withdrew to his estate, where he died in 93. His life, written by his son-in-law, Tacitus, is extant, and is considered a model of biographical writing.

Aguesseau, Henri Francois d', born in 1668; orator and advocate, took part in the contest between the Pope and the Gallican Church, 1699; was made procureur-general in 1700, and defended the Gallican Church against the Ultramontane Party. After the death of Louis XIV. was appointed chancellor in 1717, but was twice deprived of the seals, retiring from Paris 1722, but was finally restored in 1727. He was a great scholar and jurist. Died, 1751.

Aguinaldo, Emilio, General. Born in Imus, a village near Cavite, Luzon, May, 1870; educated at St. Thomas by the Dominicans. He is short of stature, with a Japanese cast of countenance. During the rebellion of the Filipinos against Spain he was in constant fear of assassination, as the Spanish Government offered a reward of $25,000 for his head. He was the chief of the insurgents and a capable man; acting as a dictator, he assumed sovereign power. In March, 1901, was captured by General Fred. Funston, a Kansas volunteer, after being in constant flight.

Ahaz, eleventh king of Judah, and son of Jotham, became tributary to Tiglath-Pileser, King of Assyria, whom he had summoned to assist him in repelling the kings of Israel and Damascus. He adopted the necromantic practices of the Syrians, and died after a reign of sixteen years. Lived Eighth Century B. C.

Alaric (al'-ar-ick). Two kings of the Visigoths have borne this appellation. Alaric I., after having despoiled several provinces of the Roman Empire, in the reign of Honorius, twice besieged Rome itself. At first he contented himself with levying heavy contributions; when he again invaded it, he plundered the city, and destroyed its noblest monuments. In 406, he extorted from Honorius the province of Spain, and a part of Gaul, and established the kingdoms of the Visigoths. He died in 410, whilst making preparations for the conquest of Africa and Sicily. Alaric II., eighth King of the Visigoths, came to the throne in 484. Besides Spain, he possessed Languedoc Provence, and various other tracks of country. Alaric held his court at Toulouse. Clovis I., King of the Franks, jealous of his power, carried war into the south of Gaul. A great battle was fought near Poitiers, in which Alaric fell by the hand of Clovis.

Albertus Magnus, born 1193, a man of great sanctity and learning, was appointed Bishop of Ratisbon, and assisted at the General Council of Lyons in 1274. He left numerous works, and amongst his scholars was the famous Thomas Aquinas. Died, 1280.

Albuquerque, Alfonso d' (ál-boo-kair'-ka), a Portuguese Viceroy of the Indies, born in 1453, made his first expedition to the East in 1503, and in 1508 became governor of the Indies. After a just and humane rule, he died at Goa, 1515.

Alcibiades (al-se-bi'-a-deez). A famous Athenian general, born at Athens about 450 B. C., and educated in the house of his uncle Pericles. He held joint command with Nicias over the expedition against Sicily; but, during his absence, being accused of impiety, he fled to Sparta, and then to Persia. Recalled to Athens, he forced the Lacedæmonians to sue for peace, and made several conquests, but again losing his popularity, he withdrew to the court of Pharnabazus, the Persian satrap, in Phrygia. His treacherous host, instigated by Lysander, King of Sparta, set fire to the place where Alcibiades lived, and in seeking to escape, he was assassinated, B. C. 404.

Alcott, Louisa May, born in 1832, an American authoress. She began early to write, but met with no marked success till the publication of "Little Women" in 1867. She wrote many other books, the material for her first volume, "Hospital Sketches," being gathered during her experience as nurse in the military hospital at Washington, where she went in 1862. Died, 1888.

Alcuin, English theologian, especially noted as the coadjutor of Charlemagne in his educational reforms. At the invitation of that emperor he left England, and settled in France, where he founded several schools; but on being made Abbot of Tours he abandoned the court and devoted himself to theology. Born, 735, died, 804.

Aldrich, Nelson Wilmarth, United States Senator from Rhode Island, December 5, 1881-1905; born in Foster, R. I., November 6, 1841; academic education; is engaged in mercantile pursuits. Chairman of Committee on Finance, and Republican leader in senate.

Al'drich, Thomas Bailey, American poet and editor; born in 1836. While engaged in the office of a New York merchant he began to write verses, the success of which soon induced him to enter on a literary career. His first volume, miscellaneous poems, was published in 1855, and was called "The Bells"; afterwards, he published "Babie Bell," several other volumes of poems, and "The Story of a Bad Boy." Mr. Aldrich was an industrious contributor to our best periodicals, and was also on the editorial staff of the "Home Journal," 1856-59, and "Every Saturday." In 1881 he became editor of the "Atlantic Monthly," but resigned in 1890. Died, 1907.

Alembert (ál-lon-bare'), Jean le Rond d', a celebrated man of letters and a mathematician, the natural son of Madame de Tencin and the poet Destouches; was born in 1717. He was the friend of Voltaire, and acquired high esteem by his works, which fill eighteen volumes. His treatises on dynamics and fluids at once established for him a reputation in science. Died, 1783.

Alexander I., Paulovich, born in 1777; Emperor of Russia and King of Poland. He succeeded to the throne in 1801, and showed himself a brave and judicious monarch. He entered into a treaty with England, Austria, and Sweden to resist the encroachments of France, but was defeated at the battles of Austerlitz, Eylau, and Friedland, and compelled to make peace with Napoleon at Tilsit. In 1812 war again broke out, and on the conclusion of peace in 1814 Alexander visited England and Poland. He was succeeded on the throne by his brother Nicholas. Died, 1825.

Alexander II., Nicholavich, Emperor of Russia, born in 1818; succeeded his father as czar in 1855. He married in 1841 Maria, daughter of the Grand Duke Louis II., of Hesse Darmstadt. He terminated the Crimean War soon after his accession by the Treaty of Paris. Though trained by his father to a military life, he devoted himself to the internal affairs of his country, improved the popular education, and emancipated the Russian serfs. He waged war successfully on Turkey in 1877-78. He was assassinated in the streets of St. Petersburg. Died, 1881.

Alexander III., of Macedon, surnamed "The Great," born in 356 B. C., son of Philip. He was educated partly by Aristotle, and early gave proofs of skill and courage.

A revolt of Thebes at the commencement of his reign was promptly quelled with great severity; then crossing the Hellespont, he marched against the Persians, whom he repeatedly defeated, conquering Phenicia and Egypt. After the final defeat of Darius at Gaugamela, and the capture of Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, Alexander commenced the conquest of India, but after crossing the Indus and penetrating as far as the Ganges, he was compelled to return to Babylon, but paused at Susa to celebrate his marriage with the daughter of Darius. He died at Babylon after a reign of about thirteen years; his body was embalmed and taken to Alexandria, which city had been founded by him and named in his honor. Died, 323 B. C.

Alexander VIII. (Pope), Pietro Ottoboni, born in 1610, Bishop of Brescia, and afterwards of Frascati; he became pope in 1689, and succeeded in reforming many abuses and re-establishing friendly relations with France. He placed in the Vatican the fine collections of books and manuscripts left him by the Queen of Sweden. Died, 1691.

Alexander, Nevskoi, Saint, born in 1219, Prince of Novogorod. A brave soldier, his surname of "Nevsky" was given him after a signal victory over the Swedes on the banks of the Neva. He submitted to Batu Khan, the Tartar Chief, who confirmed him in his dominions, and also bestowed upon him the sovereignty of Southern Russia. Died, 1263.

Alexis (a-lex'-is), Michaelowitz, a Russian emperor, born in 1629, came to the throne in 1646, and died in 1676. He was the progenitor of Peter the Great. In his reign the laws of the kingdom were first printed, various manufactories established, Moscow beautified, and many new cities built.

Alfieri (al-fe-a'-re), Victor, a Piedmontese count, born in 1749. This distinguished poet is the author of several esteemed tragedies, sonnets, and other works of fancy. He is equally celebrated for his "liaison" with the Countess of Albany. Died, 1803.

Alfonso X., of Leon and Castile, born in 1226, succeeded to the throne in 1252; aspired to be Emperor of Germany, and in 1257 divided the election with Richard of Cornwall. In 1272 he again unsuccessfully attempted to gain the imperial crown. He was driven from the throne by his son Sancho. He was the most learned ruler of his time. Died, 1284.

Alfonso XIII., King of Spain, born in 1886, son of Alfonso XII. He acceded to the throne in his own right in 1902; married, 1906, Princess Ena of Battenberg, niece of King Edward VII.

Alfred the Great, born in Wantage, Berks, 849, the youngest son of Ethelwulf, King of the West Saxons, succeeded on the death of his brother Ethelred to a throne threatened by invasion from without and dissension within. His first care was to drive off the Danes, whom he is said to have encountered in fifty-six battles by land and sea. The great victory of Edington (878) led to the peace of Wedmore, and Alfred was thus for a time free to devote himself to the peaceful reforms for which his name is renowned. Prominent amongst these are the establishment of social order, the encouragement of learning, and the founding of a national fleet. Alfred died in 901, esteemed as a religious and industrious man, and a wise and learned king.

His influence was marked and salutary on the legislation of his day.

Almanzor (al-man'-zor) (surnamed the Victorious). The second caliph of the Abassidian Dynasty, succeeded his brother, Aboul Abbas, in 753. He exterminated the race of the Ommaiades, and in 762 founded the city of Bagdad, which became the capital of his empire. Several other Mohammedan princes, famed for their martial achievements, also bore this name. He died in 774.

Alma-Tadema, Laurence, R. A., born in Friesland in 1836; painter, studied at the Royal Academy of Antwerp, and was afterwards pupil and assistant of Baron Henry Leys. He settled in England, where his pictures found a ready welcome. He was elected A.R.A. in 1876, and R. A. in 1879. Among his numerous works are "Phidias and the Elgin Marbles" (1868), "A Roman Emperor" (1871), "The Sculpture Gallery" (1875), "Sappho" (1881), and "The Roses of Heliogabalus" (1888).

Alstroemer (al-stro'-mer), Jonas, a Swede, born, 1685, remarkable for the great commercial improvements which he introduced into his native country. Of very humble origin, he was for a time unable to surmount the obstacles by which poverty depressed him. He visited England; and having minutely noticed the sources of its manufacturing prosperity, returned to Sweden, and obtained permission to establish a manufactory at Alingås, in West Gothland, his birthplace. So extensive and successful were the manufacturing and agricultural resources which he introduced into Sweden, that the state, in acknowledgment of his merit, conferred on him a patent of nobility, made him chancellor of commerce, and erected a statue to his honor on the Stockholm Exchange. Died, 1761.

Alva, Ferdinand Alvarez de Toledo, Duke of, born in 1508, Spanish governor of the Netherlands under Philip II. of Spain, and notorious for the merciless manner in which he exercised his dictatorial power. Under his rule more than 18,000 persons were sent to the scaffold, and a revolt, headed by the Prince of Orange, broke out, which, after nearly forty years of war, resulted in the independence of the provinces. Alva was recalled in 1573, but he was soon given the command of Portugal, which he quickly conquered. Though his pride and cruelty were excessive, he was undoubtedly the greatest general of his age. Died, 1582.

Alvarado, Alonzo, one of the Spanish conquerors of Mexico and Peru under Pizarro; he was defeated and made prisoner by Almagro. He afterwards joined De Castro (1542), and was lieutenant-general of the army which suppressed the rebellion of Gonzalo Pizarro in 1548. Died, 1554.

Alvarado, Pedro d', one of the Spanish conquerors of Mexico; he took part in the expedition and victories of Cortez, and was entrusted with the command of the city of Mexico, and afterwards made governor of Guatemala and Honduras. He explored California, and was killed soon after his return in an expedition against Xalisco. Died, 1541.

Amaral, Antonio Castano do, born in 1747; a learned Portuguese historian and author of the valuable "Memoirs on the Forms of Government and Customs of the Nations that Inhabited Portugal." Died, 1819.

Amasis, or Amosis (a-ma'-sis, a-mo'-sis), an Egyptian who, from a common soldier, rose to be a king of Egypt. He made war against Arabia, and died before the invasion of his country by Cambyses, King of Persia. Cambyses caused his body to be dug up, insulted, and burnt.

Amaziah (am-a-zî'-ă), the son of Joash, whom he succeeded as eighth King of Judah. He adhered to the worship of the true God, but permitted some idolatrous observances. Having arrogantly challenged Jehoash, King of Israel, to battle, the armies met at Beth-she-mesh, where Amaziah was defeated, himself taken prisoner, and subsequently his city and palace were plundered. Fifteen or sixteen years afterwards, he fled from conspirators, by whom he was overtaken and assassinated. Flourished in Eighth or Ninth Century.

Amboise, George d', born in 1460, a French cardinal and minister of state. He was successively Bishop of Montauban, Archbishop of Narbonne and of Rouen, and after acquiring considerable popularity as prime minister under Louis XII., was made cardinal and appointed legate in France, where he effected great reforms among the religious orders. Died, 1510.

Ambrose, St. (ăm'brōz), a doctor in the Latin Church of the Fourth Century, was born at Treves, 340. Consecrated archbishop of Milan, 374. Ambrose was repeatedly, in the discharge of his duty to the Church, brought into direct conflict with the highest secular authority. He rebuked Valentinian, defied Maximus, and after the massacre of Thessalonica, compelled the great Theodosius to a humiliating penance before admitting him to Christian communion. To him we owe the noble hymn, "Te Deum Laudamus." No father of the Church has a fame more wide, more beautiful, or more deserved. Died, 397.

Amerigo Vespucci, born in Florence, 1452, was an Italian navigator who visited Brazil in 1503. He had previously made several voyages of exploration, and claimed priority over Cabot and Columbus in reaching the mainland, named in his honor America, but the best authorities consider this claim to be unfounded. Died in Seville, 1512.

Ames, Fisher, born in 1758; American lawyer and politician, who sat in the Massachusetts Convention, and was afterwards a member of Congress, and famed for his eloquence. He retired from public life with Washington, and devoting himself to literary pursuits, was elected president of Harvard College in 1804. Died, 1808.

Ames, James Barr, dean Harvard Law School since 1895; born in Boston, June 22, 1846; graduate of Harvard, 1868 (1871 A. M.); Harvard Law School, 1872 (LL. D., University City of New York, University of Wisconsin, 1898; University of Pennsylvania, 1899; Northwestern, 1903; Williams, Harvard, 1904). Taught in private school, Boston, 1868-69; tutor in French and German, Harvard, 1871-72; instructor in history, 1872-73; associate professor of law, 1873-77, professor of law since 1877, Harvard. Compiled collections of cases on torts, pleading, bills and notes, partnership, trusts, suretyship, admiralty and equity jurisdiction; author of numerous articles in Harvard Law Review and other law reviews.

Amherst, Jeffrey, Lord, born in 1717; British general, served on the Continent and in America, where he succeeded Abercrombie as commander-in-chief. Here he was remarkably successful, and after many victories, Montreal surrendered and Newfoundland was recovered from the French. He was raised to the peerage in 1776, and was appointed field marshal in 1796. Died, 1797.

Ampere, Andre Marie, born in 1775; a distinguished electrician, who may be considered the father of electromagnetics. He first attracted attention by a treatise on the "Theory of Probability," published in 1802, and obtained a post as teacher, and ultimately as professor, at the polytechnic school in Paris. In 1820, Orsted's discovery of the effect of voltaic currents upon magnetic needles was brought to his notice, and Ampere verified and completed this, and showed also the mutual effect of currents upon each other, from which he deduced a new theory of magnetism. The Royal Academy of Sciences recognized his services, and gave his name to one of the electro-magnetic units. Ampere's last great work was the classification of the sciences, but this he did not live to finish. Died, 1836.

Amphietyon (am-fik'-te-on). One of the heroes of ancient Greece, son of Deucalion and Pyrrha. On the dominions of his father being divided between him and his brother Helenus, Amphietyon reigned over Thermopylae, in the Fourteenth or Fifteenth Century before Christ. In 1497 B. C., he invaded Athens, which he consecrated to Minerva, and governed it as sovereign during ten years.

Amyntas (a-min-tas), several Macedonian monarchs bore this name, of whom the principal was Amyntas III. (son of Menelaus), who came to the throne 397 B. C., after having assassinated the king, Pausanias. When expelled by the Illyrians, he was enabled by the Spartans and Thessalonians to regain his dominions. His wife, Eurydice, conspired against his life, but her plot was frustrated. He was the father of Philip, and the grandfather of Alexander the Great. Amyntas, grandson of Amyntas III., was yet in his early infancy when Perdicas, his father, and Alexander, were murdered, at the instigation of Eurydice, their mother. He was heir to the throne; but his uncle, Philip, who was his tutor, having been raised to it, Amyntas was compelled to give up his own right. He served in the armies of Philip and Alexander the Great; but, plotting against the latter, he was put to death.

Anacreon (an-ack'-re-on). A celebrated Greek lyric poet, born at Teos in Ionia, towards the close of 500 B. C. He was patronized by Polycrates, the tyrant of Samos, and Iliuparchus, the tyrant of Athens. He died at Abdera, suffocated by a grape-stone while in the act of drinking. His poems are chiefly devoted to the praises of love, pleasure, and wine.

Anacreon, born about 560; a Greek lyric poet who lived at Samos under the patronage of the tyrant Polycrates, and afterwards at Athens. His poems were admirably translated by Moore.

Anaxagoras (an-ax-ag'-o-ras), a Greek philosopher of the Ionian school, born at Clazomenae, 500 B. C. He studied under Anaximenes, and, after traveling through all the known parts of the globe, in search of knowledge, established himself at Athens, where he opened the first school of philosophy. Pericles, Socrates, and Euripides were among his pupils. He was condemned to die for alleged impiety, a sentence which was changed to exile, when he retired to Lampsacus, and there continued to teach philosophy till his death, 428 B. C.

Anaximander (an-ax-e-man'-der), a philosopher and famous mathematician of the Ionian school, born in 610 B. C. He was the first who noticed the obliquity of the ecliptic, and taught that the moon is indebted for her light to the sun, and that the earth is round. He constructed a sphere to represent the heavenly divisions, and is said to have invented geographical charts and the gnomon. He also believed in a multitude of worlds. He died 546 B. C.

Andersen, Hans Christian, born in 1805. The son of poor parents, was born at Odensee in Funen; he early showed a strong inclination for the stage, and at fourteen went to Copenhagen, where he obtained an engagement at the theater royal. His voice soon broke down, but through the kindness of Conference Councillor Collin he was admitted to the grammar school at Slagelse. His first prose work, a book of travels, was published in 1828, and was followed by others, as well as novels and poems. He is best known for his fairy tales, which are full of charm. Died, 1875.

Anderson, Mary, born in 1859, at Sacramento, California; well known as an actress of great beauty and considerable dramatic taste; at 16 years of age made her debut at Louisville as Juliet. She met with great success both in the United States and in London.

Academy, 1866; instructor of languages, 1869-75; professor of Scandinavian languages and literature, 1875-83; United States minister to Denmark, 1885-89; married July 21, 1868, to Bertha Karina Olson. Editor and publisher of "Amerika" since October, 1898. Author: "Norse Mythology," "Viking Tales of the North," "America Not Discovered by Columbus," "The Younger Edda," "First Chapter of Norwegian Immigration, 1821-1840"; also many translations of Norse books, and author of several works in Norwegian.

Anderson, Robert, born in 1805; an American general, who served under Lincoln in the Black Hawk War, and distinguished himself in the Mexican War (1846-47), in the battle of El Molino del Rey. On the outbreak of the Civil War he was appointed to the defense of Charleston Harbor, and held Fort Sumter for two days against the Confederates; failing health prevented his taking further part in the war. Died, 1871.

Andre, John, born in 1751; a British soldier who served in the war with America, and rose to the rank of major. He conducted the negotiations with Benedict Arnold for the betrayal of West Point, but being discovered in disguise, was arrested and put to death as a spy. His remains lie in Westminster Abbey, where a cenotaph was erected to his memory. Died, 1780.

Andrea, Pisano, born in 1270; an Italian architect and sculptor, who produced many fine works in Florence, his greatest being the bronze figures in relief for the baptistery of St. John's. Died in 1345.

Andrea (an'-dre-a), a distinguished engraver, who flourished in the Seventeenth Century. He obtained engravings worked by other hands, which he disposed of as his own. He engraved on wood in a peculiar style, known as "chiaro-oscuro," of which, however, he was not the inventor. One of his productions, "The Triumph of Julius Caesar," from Andrea Mantegna, the original of which is at Hampton-Court, is cut on ten blocks of wood, and dated 1598. Andrea died at an advanced age, in 1623.

Andrew, Saint, one of the twelve apostles, who before his call was a disciple of John the Baptist. He was the means of bringing his brother, Simon Peter, to Christ, and is said to have preached the Gospel in various countries, and to have been at last crucified at Patrae in Achaia.

I., January 7, 1829; graduate of Brown University, 1849; professor modern languages and literature, Brown, 1853-60; editor Providence Journal, 1860-66; president of University of Vermont, 1866-71; president University of Michigan, 1871-1909; United States Minister to China, 1880-81, acting as commissioner in negotiating important treaties; member Anglo-American International Commission on Canadian Fisheries, 1887; chairman Canadian-American Commission on Deep Waterways from Lakes to Sea, 1896; appointed minister to Turkey, 1897, but resigned May, 1898. Author numerous addresses and articles in leading reviews.

Angelo, Michael de Buonarrotti, a distinguished painter, sculptor, architect, and poet of Italy. He was born in 1475, in the territory of Arezzo, in Tuscany. At an early age he became the pupil of Dominico Ghirlandaio, a celebrated artist of his day. He soon displayed such uncommon merit, that Lorenzo de Medici took him into his service. His mastery over the grand and terrible has never been equaled; and his correct design and knowledge of anatomy has not been attained by other artists. Several editions of his poetry have been published. Michael Angelo discontinued painting in his 75th year, and terminated his brilliant career at Rome, at the advanced age of 90, in 1564. He was splendidly interred in that city by Cosmo, Duke of Tuscany, but his remains were subsequently, by command of that prince, removed to Florence, and deposited beneath a magnificent monument, embellished with three statues, representing painting, sculpture, and architecture.

Anjou, Counts and Dukes of (an-joo'), a powerful French family, connected with the regal house of Valois which maintained a considerable share of independence until the reign of Louis XI. One of its members, Fulke, became King of Jerusalem, 1131; and his son, Geoffroy, founded the royal house of Plantagenet. The second house of Anjou was a branch of the royal family of France. The title of Duke d'Anjou was also borne by several sons of kings of France, and lastly by a grandson of Louis XIV., who became Philip V. of Spain.

Anna Comnena (kom-nē'-na), the daughter of Alexius Comnenus I., by his wife Irene, was born at Constantinople, in 1083. She devoted herself to the study of literature and philosophy, and was esteemed the most learned female of her age. After the death of her father, she conspired to depose her brother, and to place the crown upon the head of her husband, Nicephorus Bryennius. Her plot being discovered, she lost all her influence at court, and employed the last ten years of her life in composing a history of her father's reign, called the "Alexiad." Died, 1148.

Anne of Austria, the eldest daughter of Philip III. of Spain, was born in 1601, and married Louis XIII., King of France, in 1615. Upon the death of her consort, in 1643, she was declared queen-regent, during the minority of her son. She placed unbounded confidence in Cardinal Mazarin, whose rule was so unpopular that a civil war ensued, which compelled the queen and her son to fly from Paris, and to solicit the aid of the great Condé. In 1661, the young king assumed the reins of government, and Anne retired, to pass the remainder of her life in religious exercises. She died from the effects of a cancer in her breast, in 1666.

Anne of Beaujeu, daughter of Louis XI., married Peter Beaujeu, Duke of Bourbon, and constable of France. She acted as regent of the kingdom during the minority of her brother, Charles VIII. Born, 1462, died in 1522.

Anne Boleyn, the second queen of Henry VIII., was born in 1507. She was the daughter of Sir Thomas Boleyn, and a maid of honor to Queen Katherine, whom Henry divorced, that he might raise Anne to the throne, who became the mother of Queen Elizabeth. The fickle king caused her to be decapitated in May, 1536.

Anne of Brittany, the daughter and heiress of Duke Francis II., was born in 1476. In 1491 she was united to Charles VIII., King of France, and governed the kingdom during the expedition of that prince to Italy. After his death, she married Louis XII. in 1499, over whom she exercised great influence. She died in 1514.

Anne of Cleves, the fourth wife of Henry VIII., to whom she was married in 1538. She was the daughter of John, third Duke of Cleves. The match was projected by Cromwell, and was partly the cause of that minister's ruin. Henry put her aside, settled on her a liberal annuity, with which she was well satisfied, and she spent the remainder of her days in England, where she died in 1557.

Anne, Queen of England, was the second daughter of King James II., by his first wife, Ann Hyde, and was born in 1664. In 1683, she married Prince George, brother to the King of Denmark, by whom she had a numerous family of children, all of whom died young. Anne ascended the throne on the 8th of March, 1702. She established a fund, known as "Queen Anne's Bounty," for the augmentation of the livings of the poor clergy. During her reign (which was made illustrious by the military triumphs of the Duke of Marlborough), Sir George Rooke and Sir Cloudesley Shovel conquered the fortress of Gibraltar, a possession which Spain has never been able to regain; and the legislative union of Scotland with England was effected. The glorious galaxy of writers, in almost every branch of learning, who flourished in her time, has caused it to be considered the Augustan age of British literature. She died on the 1st of August, 1714.

Annunzio, Gabriele d', the pseudonym of the Italian poet Gaetano Rapagnetto; was born in 1864, on a boat in the Adriatic; educated in a college at Prato, near Florence, and studied in Rome. He was elected, in 1898, a deputy in the Italian Parliament. His first volume of verse, "Primavera," appeared in 1879, and was followed by "In Memoriam," 1880; "Canto Novo," 1882; "Intermezzo di Reine," 1883. His "Odi Novelli" reached their ninth edition in 1899. Of his numerous novels, the first, "Terra Vergine," appeared in 1882; "Il Piacere" obtained ten editions between 1889 and 1898. He then turned to the drama, with "Un Sogno d'un Mattino di Primavera," "Giaconda," "Francesca da Rimini," produced by Signora Duse at the Adelphi in 1903, and "Più che l' Amore," produced at Rome, November, 1906.

Anselm, Saint, born in 1034; Archbishop of Canterbury during the reigns of William Rufus and Henry I., to which post he was summoned from his position as Abbot of Bec in Normandy. He was a man of great piety and intellectual power, and firmly resisted the efforts of the king to despoil the Church of her dignity or revenues. He died at Canterbury in 1109 and was canonized in the reign of Henry VII.

Anthony the Great, St. (ăn'to-ne), the founder of monastic institutions, was born A. D., 251 near Heraclea, in Upper Egypt. In 205, having sold all his property and given the proceeds to the poor, he withdrew into the desert whither a number of disciples were attracted by his reputation for sanctity; and thus was formed the first community of monks. He afterwards went to Alexandria to seek the honor of martyrdom amid the persecutions there raging against the Christians; but as his life was spared, he again returned to the desert, and died at the great age of 105.

Anthony, Susan Brownell, reformer; born in Adams, Mass., February 15, 1820; educated in school maintained by father for his own and neighboring children, Battenville, N. Y., and 1837-38 at Friends' Boarding School, West Philadelphia. Taught school from age of 15 to 30; aided, 1852, in organizing the first State woman's temperance society; active in anti-slavery and woman's rights work; organizer and secretary of Women's National Loyal League during Civil War. Since war, was entirely devoted to the woman suffrage movement; founded, 1868, "The Revolution," exclusively woman's rights paper; managed it several years; in 1869 organized, with Mrs. Stanton, National Woman Suffrage Association; joint author with Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Mrs. Matilda Joslyn Gage of "The History of Woman Suffrage" (3 volumes), and of Volume IV. with Mrs. Ida Husted Harper; contributed to leading magazines and lectured in England and throughout the United States. Died, 1906.

Antigonos, Cyclops or "one-eyed," a distinguished general of Alexander the Great, on whose death he became Governor of Phrygia, Lycia, and Pamphylia, and after defeating and slaying Eumenes, and waging other successful wars, assumed the title of king. His ambitious schemes united his rivals, and he was slain in battle at Ipsus. Died, 301 B. C.

Antiochus (ăn-ti'o-kūs), a favorite royal name in ancient Syria, no less than eleven of her kings bearing it. The most noted was Antiochus III., the Great, contemporary with Hannibal, 223 B. C., and Antiochus IV., his son.

Antipater, born in 390 B. C.; the Macedonian, the friend and minister of Philip and Alexander the Great, during the absence of the latter was appointed regent of Macedonia and Greece, and in that capacity defeated the Greeks. On the death of Alexander Antipater received the government of Macedonia. Died, 319 B. C.

Antipater of Idumea, father of Herod the Great; took part in the disputes between Hyrcanus II. and Aristobulus II. He assisted in placing Hyrcanus on the throne of Judæa 63 B. C., and contrived to get the power in his own hands. He was afterwards appointed Procurator of all Judæa. Died, 43 B. C.

Antoinette (ăn-twä-nět'), Marie, Archduchess of Austria, was born at Vienna, November 2, 1755. She was the daughter of the Emperor Francis I. and Maria Theresa, and was given in marriage to the Dauphin, son of Louis XV., in 1770, being then 15 years of age. Her beauty and amiable conduct gained universal admiration. Her consort having ascended the throne as Louis XVI., during the troubles which occurred in the latter years of his reign she became the object of popular hatred. She was confined in the same prison with her husband for some time, but afterwards separated from him and detained in the Conciergerie, whence, after much suffering, she was carried before a Revolutionary tribunal in October, 1793, by judgment of which she suffered by the guillotine on the same day.

Antomarchi (an-to-mar'-ke), Doctor, a celebrated anatomist, born in 1780 in Corsica. When Napoleon was a captive he was selected to attend the deposed emperor. He remained with him in his last moments, and refused to sign the document prepared on the examination of the corpse by the English surgeons. He died in 1838.

Antoninus Pius, Titus, adopted son and successor of Hadrian, Emperor of Rome, was born in 86. His reign of twenty-three years was powerful and prosperous. He died in 161.

Antony, Mark. See Mark Antony.

Apelles (a-pel'-leez), a celebrated Greek painter, born in the island of Cos, according to Pliny, but by some writers said to have been a native of Ephesus. During the reign of Philip, father to Alexander the great, Apelles visited Macedon. The monarch became his patron and friend, as did Alexander after him. The latter would not permit any one else to paint his portrait. His most famous works are "Venus asleep," and "Venus Anadyomene." He died in the island which is supposed to have been his native place.

Apollodorus of Damascus, a great architect of the Second Century, worked at Rome for the Emperor Trajan, and built the forum and column which bear that monarch's name, but his greatest work was a huge bridge over the Danube at its confluence with the Alt. He was banished and put to death by Hadrian.

Apollonius (a-pol'-lo'-ne-us), called the Rhodian (Apollonius Rhodius), was born in Alexandria, B. C., 230. He presided over an academy at Rhodes, was an eminent rhetorician, and wrote a poem, in four books, on the expedition of the Argonauts, and other poems. This name was also borne by a mathematician of Perga in Pamphylia, who lived in 240 B. C.; by a Roman senator, and Christian martyr, who suffered in 186; and by a sophist, a stoic, and a Pythagorean philosopher.

Apollo (a-pol'-los), a Jew born in Alexandria, and converted in the time of the Apostles to Christianity. In the year 54, being at Ephesus, and famed for eloquence and Scriptural knowledge, he preached the gospel in the absence of St. Paul. At Corinth he preached with great success, and was there promoted to the dignity of a bishop.

Aquinas (a-kwi'-nas), St. Thomas d', popularly called the "Angelic Doctor," was a descendant from the counts of Aquino, in Calabria. He was born in 1224, and in 1323 Pope John XXII. enrolled his name in the calendar of saints. His writings, which are very highly esteemed among Catholics, gave rise to a sect called Thomists. Died, 1274.

Arago (är-ä-go'), Dominique, a celebrated French philosopher; was born February 26, 1786. In 1806, he was engaged, with Biot, in measuring an arc of meridian. His subsequent life was distinguished by an ardent and successful devotion to science; he was also eminent as a liberal politician. He died in October, 1853.

Arbaces (ar-ba'-seez), a general of the Medes, who served under Sardanapalus, King of Assyria. Disgusted with the effeminacy of that monarch, Arbaces took arms against him, and compelled him to fly to Nineveh, where he committed suicide, when Arbaces ascended his throne, which he filled for twenty-eight years.

Arc, Joan of, a celebrated heroine, otherwise called the Maid of Orleans, was born at Domremy, on the borders of Lorraine, January 6, 1412. She was the daughter of humble peasants, and in her earlier years is said to have tended horses, and rendered other menial services as the servant at a small inn. In her eighteenth year, however, professing to have a divine mission to be the saviour of her country, she got herself introduced to the Dauphin Charles, headed his troops, and infusing courage into his dispirited adherents, restored his fallen fortunes in a most incredibly short period, and secured to him the crown of France. Eventually she fell into the hands of the English, and having been delivered over by them to the Burgundians and their French partisans, the latter caused her to be condemned to the flames as a heretic and sorceress, in 1431.

Archelaus, a Cappadocian, the distinguished general of Mithridates VI., flourished in the First Century B. C. After defeating Nicomedes III. at Amnias, 88 B. C., he sailed to Greece, captured Delos and other towns, and induced Achaia, Lacedemon, and Boëtia to form an alliance with Mithridates against Rome. Sulla besieged him in the Piræus, and compelled him to withdraw his forces. Returning to the contest with a still larger army, Archelaus was again defeated and forced to retire, when, acting upon instructions received from Mithridates, he concluded peace with Sulla, but upon terms unsatisfactory to the king, and he finally deserted to the Romans, after which little is known of him.

Archimedes (ar-ke-me'-deez), a renowned mathematician, whose astonishing skill in mechanics was such, that some of the greatest real triumphs of antiquity may be ascribed to him. His inventions amazed his contemporaries: the lifting of weights by means of pulleys, and the endless screw, are among them. A Roman historian celebrates the warlike engines produced by the skill of Archimedes. His mind ever fruitful of extraordinary resources, when Syracuse was besieged by Marcellus, he constructed a burning-glass, on a scale of such magnitude, that by means of it the enemy's fleet was fired. Eventually the city being taken, he was found among the slain.

Argand, Aime', born in 1755, a chemist of Geneva, inventor of the Argand lamp, which he brought out in England in 1782. The patent was also claimed by a Frenchman, Ambroise Langé, and finally taken out in France in their joint names, the priority of invention being conceded to Argand. The French Revolution, however, deprived him of all profit from his patent. Died, 1803.

Ariosto (ar-e-os'-to), Ludovico, a famous Italian poet. He was born at Reggio in 1474, and educated at Ferrara. His writings were numerous, but his "Orlando Furioso" is the work which established his fame. Died, 1533.

Aristides (ar-is-ti'-deez), an Athenian patriot whose unbending integrity gained for him among his countrymen the name of The Just. He distinguished himself at Marathon, Salamis, and Plataea. After gaining great honor for virtuous conduct, he died poor, 467 B. C. There were also, an orator of Adriani in Mysia, a Christian philosopher in Athens, a painter of Thebes, a historian mentioned by Plutarch as of Miletus, and a Greek musician, who bore the same name.

Aristophanes (a-ris-tof'-a-nee). The most celebrated of the ancient Athenian writers of comedy, contemporary with Socrates and Plato. He wrote fifty-four comedies, of which eleven only remain. In one of them, "The Clouds," Socrates (or rather the philosophy of the age) is held up to ridicule. The date of his death is not known.

Aristotle (ar'-is-tot-l), a distinguished philosopher, born at Stagira in Thrace, 384 B. C. When seventeen years of age, he had the advantage of being placed under Plato, who pronounced his eulogy by describing him to be "the mind" of his academy. His growing fame caused Philip of Macedon to make him tutor to his son Alexander. That prince is said to have profited from his sage counsel to restore towns that he had ruined. Pursued by envy, Aristotle was accused of impiety, and retired to Chalcis, where he died 322 B. C.

Arius (a'-ri-us), a presbyter in the Church of Alexandria, who lived in the Fourth Century. His doctrine was that the Father and Son were essentially distinct. That the latter was created out of nothing by the will of the former. For this he was excommunicated and banished, but having been recalled, was about again to enter the Church from which he had been exiled, when he suddenly expired. The sect called Arians are named after him, but they do not adopt all his opinions.

Arkwright, Sir Richard, born in 1732; a Lancashire barber, renowned as the inventor of the spinning-frame. Of humble birth, he exhibited considerable mechanical skill, joined with the greatest industry. In 1767 he attempted to solve the problem of perpetual motion, and soon after, with the help of a clock maker named Kay, his spinning inventions began to take shape. He then entered into partnership with a firm of stocking manufacturers, and his invention was patented in 1769, and though many difficulties arose, from infringements of the patent, the hostility of the work-people, and disputes to his claim as the inventor of his machines, Arkwright was enabled to rise from poverty, and was chosen to present a congratulatory address to George III. in 1786, on which occasion he was knighted. Died, 1792.

Armour, Jonathan Ogden, capitalist, packer; born in Milwaukee, Wis., November 11, 1863; entered Yale but did not complete course, yielding to request of father that he should return to Chicago and relieve him of some of his business cares. Now president of Corporation of Armour & Co., packers, and director in other corporations.

Arnheim or Arnim, George, Baron von, born in 1581, a distinguished general and politician, who took part in the Thirty Years' War, serving successively under Gustavus Adolphus, Wallenstein, and the Elector of Saxony. After gaining the decisive victory of Liegnitz (1634) he retired to his estates, but was seized and imprisoned by the King of Sweden; he escaped, however, but died soon after. Died, 1641.

Arnold, Benedict, born in 1741; American general, a brave but unprincipled man. At fifteen he enlisted in the English army, but soon deserted, and adopted a mercantile life. In the Anglo-American War Arnold took an extremely active part, his skill and gallantry being especially exhibited in the siege of Quebec and the victories of Ridgfield and Benis. Meanwhile a party hostile to him had been growing up; his due promotion was deferred, several serious charges were brought against him, the fortunes of the Americans grew worse and worse, and he became affected with the prevalent spirit of desertion. Accordingly he entered into negotiation with the British commander, and treacherously asked and obtained the command of West Point, with the intention of surrendering it to the enemy; the capture of André betrayed his duplicity, and the traitor fled in disgrace to the English army at New York. Here he was appointed brigadier-general, and after serving against his countrymen, retired to London. Died, 1801.

Arnold, Sir Edwin, born in 1832, died, 1904; journalist and poet, educated at King's College, London, and Oxford, where he won the Newdigate Prize in 1852. He was for several years principal of the Government Sanscrit College at Poonah, Bombay Presidency, but resigned his post in 1861, when he first became connected with the "Daily Telegraph," for which he long continued to write, finally being appointed editor. His "Light of Asia" (1879) achieved extraordinary popularity, and obtained him a high place amongst the poets of the day.

Arnold, Matthew, born in 1822, eldest son of Dr. Arnold of Rugby, was educated at Winchester, Rugby, and Balliol College, Oxford, and was a distinguished critic, poet, scholar, and theologian. He was elected Fellow of Oriel College in 1845, and in 1851, after having been for some time private secretary to Lord Lansdowne, he was appointed Lay Inspector of Schools under the Committee of Council on Education, in which capacity he twice visited the Continent for the purpose of collecting information, and which appointment he resigned in 1886. His poetic activity was manifested in early life; for ten years (1857-1867) he held the chair of poetry at Oxford, and amongst his productions may be noted his Newdigate prize poem "Cromwell" (1843), "The Strayed Reveller," and a volume of "New Poems" published in 1869. As a critic he holds a very high place. His later works were chiefly theological, being attempts to grapple with the supernatural aspects of Christianity from a rationalistic standpoint. "St. Paul and Protestantism" (1871), "Literature and Dogma" (1873), and "God and the Bible" (1875), are among his writings. Died, 1888.

Arnold, Thomas, D. D., born in 1795, was educated at Winchester, and Corpus Christi College, Oxford. In 1815 he became Fellow of Oriel, obtaining in that year the Chancellor's Prize for the Latin and in 1817 for the English essay. After taking holy orders, he passed nine years at Laleham, near Staines, in literary occupations, and in preparing young men for the universities. Appointed head master of Rugby School in 1828, he raised that institution beyond all precedent, both by the remarkable success of his pupils and by the introduction of new branches of study into the Rugby course. He was of the Broad Church school of thought, and a vigorous opposer of the then new Tractarian movement. In 1841 he was appointed professor of modern history at Oxford. The best known of Dr. Arnold's works are his edition of "Thucydides," his "History of Rome" (unfinished), and his sermons delivered in the chapel of Rugby School. Died, 1842.

Artemisia, Queen of Halicarnassus, wife and successor of Mausolus, to whose memory she erected a splendid monument, which has given to similar erections the name of "mausoleum."

Arteveld, Jacob van, popular Flemish leader in the Fourteenth Century, assisted Edward III. in his French wars, and for nine years was practically ruler of Flanders. He determined to convert his country into a kingdom, and offered the crown to the Prince of Wales, which led to a tumult in which he was slain. Died, 1345.

Arthur, Chester Alan, born in 1830; twenty-first President of the United States; took a leading part in the Civil War, and from 1871-78 was collector of the port of New York City. When Garfield was elected president, he was vice-president, and on the former's assassination succeeded to the presidency. Died, 1886.

Arthur, Julia, actress; born in Hamilton, Ont., May 3, 1869, of Irish and Welsh parentage; real name, Ida Lewis, stage name being taken from her mother's maiden name of Arthur. At 11, played in amateur dramatic club, taking part of Gamora in "The Honeymoon" and of Portia in "The Merchant of Venice"; three years later made professional début as the Prince of Wales in "Daniel Bandmann's presentation of Richard III."; remained three seasons with that company; studied violin music and dramatic art in England; first New York success at Union Square Theater in "The Black Masque"; later in A. M. Palmer's company in several rôles, notably in "Mercedes," 1893; London début, February 1, 1895, in Henry Irving's company, playing rôles next to Miss Terry; especially successful as Rosamond in "A'Becket," with Irving and Terry in United States, 1896. Now, Mrs. B. P. Cheney.

Asbury, Francis, born in 1745; the "Pioneer Bishop," an English Methodist preacher who undertook an evangelistic mission to America in 1771, by the wish of John Wesley. In 1784 he was ordained Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church of America. Thenceforth his life was devoted with untiring energy to the organization and extension of that Church. Died, 1816.

Ashmole, Elias, born in 1617; astrologer and antiquary, held the appointment of Windsor Herald, and published the "History of the Order of the Garter." He left many works, and presented to the University of Oxford his valuable collection of coins, specimens, and manuscripts. Died, 1692.

Aspasia (as-pa'-se-a), a beautiful Athenian courtesan. Socrates is said to have been one of her admirers. In order to marry her, Pericles repudiated his wife. An affront offered to Aspasia is said to have caused the Peloponnesian War.

Asquith, Rt. Hon. H. H., Prime Minister of England, was born in 1852, and entered the British Parliament in 1886. He was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, and was admitted to the bar, Lincoln's Inn, 1876. In the course of the Home Rule debates, he rose rapidly to the first rank in the House. He was entrusted with the conduct of the Disestablishment of the Church of Wales Bill in 1894. On the defeat of the Rosebery Ministry in June, 1895, he resumed practice at the bar. He was one of the most effective speakers on the Liberal side during 1903 on the Education question and the War Commission's report, and during 1903, 1904, and 1905, in opposition to Mr. Chamberlain's fiscal policy. Chancellor of the Exchequer, December, 1905. On the death of Campbell-Bannerman, 1908, he became Prime Minister.

Astor, John Jacob, capitalist; born in Rhinebeck, N. Y., July 13, 1864; son of William, grandson of William B., and great-grandson of John Jacob Astor; B. S., Harvard, 1888; traveled abroad, 1888-91; since then has been manager of the family estates; built (1897) Astoria Hotel, New York, adjoining Waldorf Hotel, which was built by William Waldorf Astor, his cousin, the two now forming one building under the name of Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, one of the largest and probably most costly hotels in the world. Was colonel, staff of Governor Levi P. Morton, and on May, 1898, commissioned lieutenant-colonel of United States Volunteers; presented to the government a mountain battery for use in war against Spain, said to have cost over $100,000. After assisting Major-General Breckinridge, Inspector-General U. S. A., in inspection of camp and troops at Chickamauga Park, Ga., assigned to duty on staff of Major-General Shafter, and served in Cuba in operations ending in surrender of Santiago. Has invented a bicycle brake, a pneumatic road improver, and an improved turbine engine. Author: "A Journey in Other Worlds," etc.

Astor, William Waldorf, capitalist, author; born in New York, March 31, 1848; son of John Jacob and Charlotte Augusta (Gibbes) A.; great-grandson of John Jacob, founder of the Astor fortune. Educated by private tutors, finishing in Europe; entered office of the Astor Estate, 1871; succeeded his father, 1890, as head of the Astor family, with personal fortune estimated at about $100,000,000. Member of New York Legislature, 1878-81; United States minister to Italy, 1882-85; removed to England, 1890; became owner "Pall Mall Gazette" and "Pall Mall Magazine." Author: "Valentino, a Story of Rome"; "Sforza, an Historical Romance of the Sixteenth Century in Italy," etc. Has for many years lived in England.

Atahualpa, the last of the Incas of Peru, succeeded his father Huayna Capac, in 1525, on the throne of Quito whilst his half-brother, Huascar, although the rightful heir, obtained only the kingdom of Peru. The two brothers engaged in a struggle for supremacy, in which Huascar was defeated. The Spaniards under Pizarro, taking advantage of these internal dissensions, invaded Peru, and by an act of deliberate perfidy obtained possession of the person of Atahualpa, and attempted to compel him to acknowledge the King of Spain as master, and to embrace the Christian religion. His refusal was made a pretext for a massacre, and the imprisonment of their king, whom the Spaniards induced to raise an enormous treasure in the hopes of regaining his throne. After a mock trial, however, he was condemned and strangled at the stake. Died, 1533.

Athanasius (a-tha-na'-shus) Saint, was born in Egypt about the year 296, entered the Church at an early age, and was chosen bishop of Alexandria in 326. He is esteemed one of the most eminent among the ancient fathers of the Church. He was a violent opponent of Arius; and his earnest advocacy of the Catholic faith, more particularly of the doctrine of the Trinity, subjected him to much persecution from the emperors Constantine and Julian, by both of whom he was several times exiled, but he finally closed his days in tranquility in 373, in the forty-eighth year of his prelacy. His works are numerous, but consist chiefly of invectives against his enemies, and controversial treatises against Arianism. The more important of his writings are his "Apologies," "Two Books on the Incarnation," "Conference with the Arians," "The Life of St. Anthony," "The Abridgment of the Holy Scriptures," "Letters to Those that Lead a Monastic Life," and "Letters to Serapion."

Athelstan (äth'-el-stän), or Æthelstan, one of the ablest of the Anglo-Saxon kings, born about 895, succeeded his father, Edward the Elder, 925. In 937 he gained a great victory at Brunenburg, over the Danes, Scots, etc., and reigned over all the island except Cumbria, Wales, Cornwall, and Scotland, which were tributary to him. Died without issue, 941.

Athenagoras (ath-e-nag'-o-ras), a Christian philosopher, born in Athens, who lived toward the close of the Second Century. His conversion to Christianity has been likened to that of St. Paul. Writing against the Christians, in order to render his attacks more formidable, he referred to the Scriptures, and by reading them was converted to the true faith. A "Discourse on the Resurrection of the Dead" and his "Apology for Christians" were much admired.

Attila (at'-te-la), a king of the Huns, who lived in the Fifth Century. He styled himself "The Scourge of God," and devastated Lombardy. The city of Venice was founded by those who fled before him. On his death, in 453, his body was buried in three coffins, made of silver, gold, and iron. The captives who dug his grave were put to death.

Atwood, George, F. R. S., a distinguished mathematician, and author of many valuable scientific works, born in 1745, and died in 1807.

Atwood, Thomas, born in 1767, was the son of a coal merchant. He commenced his musical education in the choir of the Chapel Royal under Dr. Nares. The celebrated Mozart, under whom he studied, thought highly of his talents. In 1796 he was appointed organist of St. Paul's. He wrote coronation anthems for George IV. and William IV., and died in 1838.

Auber, Daniel Francois Esprit, born in 1782; French composer, was intended for a business career, and it was not until he met with Scribe, in 1823, that his long course of successful composition commenced. "La Muette de Portici," or "Masaniello," as it is called in England, was brought out in 1828. He produced many other works which enjoy a European reputation, his last being "Le Rêve d'Amour" (1870), composed shortly before his death. Died, 1871.

Aubigne, Jean Henri Merle d', born in 1794; Swiss theologian and writer, studied at Leipsic and Berlin, and became professor of Church history at Geneva in 1830. He was author of "The History of the Reformation of the Sixteenth Century," and other works. Died, 1872.

Audubon, John James, born in 1780; a celebrated American naturalist of French descent; a pupil of the great painter David; from his childhood he was devoted to natural history, but it was not until 1830 that the first of the four volumes of his great work, "The Birds of America," appeared. This magnificent collection of plates, which was sold for $1,000 a copy, was quickly followed by explanatory letterpress under the title of "American Ornithological Biography." Audubon also projected a similar work on the "Quadrupeds of America," but much of this work was done by his sons, John and Victor. Died, 1851.

Auerbach, Berthold, born in 1812; German novelist, was a native of the Black Forest; his reputation was established by the publication, in 1843, of his "Village Tales from the Black Forest," and this was followed by a number of other popular novels. Among his earlier works were a translation of Spinoza's writings, and an essay on modern Jewish literature. He died at Cannes in 1882, shortly after the publication of "Brigitta."

Augustine, Saint, one of the fathers of the Christian Church, was born at Tagaste in Africa, in 354. In his youth he was favorable to the Manichean doctrines. Subsequently he became Bishop of Hippo, and wrote with great force against all whom he deemed heretics. He died in 430. Another St. Augustine (or St. Austen), called the "Apostle of the English," was sent with a party of forty monks by Pope Gregory I. to preach the Gospel in England in 597, where he was advanced to be first Archbishop of Canterbury. The exact date of his death is not known.

Augustulus, Romulus, the last of the Roman emperors in the West, was the son of Orestes, who, after deposing Julian Nepos, advanced him to the throne. Odoacer, a barbarian, raised a mutiny against him, and having put Orestes to death, compelled Augustulus to resign his imperial dignity. He was then dismissed with his family, and allowed 6,000 pieces of gold annually for his maintenance in the castle of Luculus in Campania.

Augustus, Caius Julius Cæsar Octavianus, a Roman emperor, born 63 B. C., was the son of Caius Octavius and Accia, niece of Julius Cæsar, by whom he was adopted when but four years of age. He was in Epirus when Julius Cæsar was assassinated, but speedily returned to claim his inheritance. Connected with Antony and Lepidus, Octavianus shared the guilt which stains the name of the triumvirate. His colleagues put aside, at the age of 36, he became emperor, with the title of Augustus. His reign was fortunate, good laws were framed in it, and the arts flourished under his protection. He died, A. D., 14.

Aurelianus, Claudius or Lucius Domitius, Emperor of Rome, born in 212, the son of a peasant; entered the Roman army, his exploits in which attracted the notice of the emperors Valerian and Claudius, and on the death of the latter in 270, he was proclaimed emperor. His short reign was a series of brilliant victories: the Goths and Vandals were subdued, the Alemanni, who threatened Rome itself, were exterminated, Palmyra was sacked, and in the splendid triumph of Aurelian were led captive Tetricus, the ex-emperor of Gaul, Britain and Spain, and Zenobia, the renowned Queen of the East. A formidable rebellion at home was crushed with terrible sternness, and the emperor's severity made him feared even by his friends, who, as they deemed in pure self-defense, conspired against him and put him to death. Died, 275.

Aurelius, Antoninus Marcus, born in 121 A. D.; Emperor of Rome, was the adopted son of Antoninus Pius, to whose throne he succeeded in 161, and took as associate Lucius Verus. Most of his reign was disturbed by wars with the Germans. Aurelius was distinguished for his love of truth and his adhesion to the Stoic school of philosophy, and his "Meditations" still exist, and give a trustworthy record of his private opinions. Died, 180.

Aurungzebe (aw-rung-ze'-be), Emperor of Hindostan, known as the Great Mogul, was born in 1618. The third son of Shah Jehan, he affected devotion in early life but subsequently, at the call of ambition, he deposed his father and put to death his two brothers and nephew. As emperor, his career was brilliant. He conquered Golconda, Visapour, and Bengal. His sons disturbed his latter days by attempting to depose him. He died in 1707.

Austen, Jane, novelist; born in 1775, at Steventon, Hants, England, of which parish her father was rector. Her principal productions are "Pride and Prejudice" (composed 1796, published 1813), "Sense and Sensibility" (1811), and "Emma" (1816). They are distinguished for originality, naturalness, and fidelity of delineation, qualities in which the literature of her time was most deficient. Her family moved successively to Bath and Chawton, and she died at Winchester in 1817, and was buried in the cathedral.

Austin, Alfred, born in 1835; critic, journalist, and satirical poet, was educated for the bar, but resigned that profession for literature. As a strong Conservative, is one of the editors of the "National Review," and has acted as correspondent to the "Standard."

Averrhoes, the great Arabian philosopher, born about 1120, of good birth, and a pupil of Avenpace and Avenzoar. He devoted his life to the study of Aristotle. He was banished for awhile from Cordova, and his views were condemned by the University of Paris in 1240. Died, 1198.

Avery, Elroy McKendree, author; born in Erie, Monroe County, Mich., July 14, 1844; graduate of University of Michigan, Ph. B., 1871; served in Civil War; mustered out at close as sergeant-major of 11th Michigan Volunteer Cavalry. Principal of high school, Battle Creek, Mich., and high and normal schools, Cleveland, O. Member of Cleveland City Council, 1891-92; of Ohio Senate, 1893-97; member of many historical and economic societies. Author: "Elementary Physics," "Elements of Natural Philosophy," "Physical Technics," "Teachers' Hand Book of Natural Philosophy," "Elements of Chemistry," "Teachers' Hand Book of Chemistry," "Complete Chemistry," "First Principles of Natural Philosophy," "Words Correctly Spoken," "Columbus and the Columbia Brigade," "School Physics," "Elementary Physics," "First Lessons in Physical Science," "School Chemistry," "The Town Meeting," "History of the United States and Its People," 16 vols.

Avicenna, Ibn Sina, born in 980; the celebrated Arab physician, a native of Bokhara, was author of the world-famed "Book of the Canon of Medicine." Died, 1037.

Baba, Ali, was elected Dey of Algiers in 1710, after the revolution in which Ibrahim Dey was killed. At great sacrifice of life, Baba liberated Algiers from the dominion of Turkey, and its independence was maintained until the French invasion in 1830. Died, 1718.

Bach, Johann Sebastian (bäk), an eminent German musical composer, born in 1685, became court organist at Weimar, and finally director of music at the school of St. Thomas, Leipzig. Bach was almost unrivaled as an organist. His works are thoroughly original, profoundly scientific, and most difficult of execution. Died, 1750.

Bacon, Augustus Octavius, United States senator from Georgia; born in Bryan County, Georgia, October 20, 1839; graduate of University of Georgia, 1859; law department of same, 1860. Served as regimental adjutant and staff captain in Confederate States Army; in law practice in Macon since 1866; member several State Democratic conventions (president, 1880); delegate National Democratic Convention, 1884; several times candidate for Democratic nomination for governor of Georgia; presidential elector, 1868; member, 1870-82, 1892, and 1893; speaker, 1873-74 and 1877-81, Georgia House of Representatives; Democrat. Elected to the United States Senate, 1895; reelected, 1901 and 1907.

Bacon, Francis (bä'kn), Lord Verulam, and Viscount St. Alban's, one of the greatest of modern philosophers, was born in London in 1561. Entering parliament in 1593, he was knighted in 1603, and in 1613 became attorney-general and privy-councillor. The office of Lord Keeper was given him in 1617, and he was soon afterwards made Lord Chancellor. But from this time dates the beginning of his miserable fall. Complaints were made of his venality as a judge, which on inquiry by a parliamentary committee were verified; Bacon then made full confession, was deprived of his offices, fined, and imprisoned during the royal pleasure. He was ultimately pardoned, but continued to live in retirement, devoting himself to his favorite studies. The great aim of this extraordinary man was to reform the methods of philosophy; he recalls men from blindly following authority to the observation and examination of nature. His "Essays" were published in 1597, but his greatest works are the "Novum Organum" (1603), and the "De Augmentis Scientiarum" (1620). Died, 1626.

Bacon, Roger, an English scientist and publicist of the Thirteenth Century, the most learned of his day, is reputed to have advocated the change since made in the calendar, to have invented gunpowder, and is known to have manufactured magnifying glasses. His great work, "Opus Majus," urges philosophical reform, and is a marvel of learning and prophecy.

He joined Kossuth in 1848 in the revolt against Austria, and won several battles for the national cause. Later, he entered the service of the Turkish Sultan, adopting the Mohammedan religion. Died, 1850.

Bembo, Pietro, born in 1470; an eminent Italian cardinal, and a profound scholar. His early life he spent studying in one city and another, and he attained such a reputation for culture that when, in 1512, he went to Rome he was appointed one of the pontifical secretaries, and in 1539 he was created cardinal. He wrote prose and verse, both in Italian and Latin, and his compositions are most remarkable for their purity of style. Died, 1547.

Benedict, St., a monk who founded the first religious order in the West; was born at Nursia, in the Duchy of Spoleto, in 480. At an early age he retired to a cavern to devote himself to study; this austerity gained him fame. By him the monastery of Monte Cassino, near Naples, was established in 528. One leading principle which he laid down was, that the order should maintain themselves by the labor of their hands, which greatly conduced to their subsequent prosperity. He died in 543.

Benjamin, Judah Philip, born in 1811; an American politician, who later became a distinguished member of the English bar. He was born in the West Indies, and practiced as a barrister at New Orleans. He sat in the senate, and became attorney-general and secretary of state to the Confederate Government under Jefferson Davis. When the cause of the South was lost, he fled to England, and was, by influence, at once called to the English bar, where he gained a large and influential practice. Died, 1884.

Benton, Thomas H., an eminent American statesman, born in North Carolina in 1782; died in 1858, after holding a seat in Congress from Missouri for thirty years. He was a consistent Jackson Democrat in politics. His "Thirty Years' View" embraces a history of the government from 1820 to 1850, and is recognized as a standard authority.

Berkeley, George, born in 1684, an English divine, famous for the keenness of his intellect and the greatness of his nature. He was born in Ireland, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin. In 1709 he published his "Theory of Vision," and in 1710 his "Principles of Human Knowledge," proving the non-existence of matter, a view which he afterwards elaborated. Going to England he made the acquaintance of the great literary men of the day, and in 1724 was made Dean of Derry. In 1725 he published "A Scheme for Converting the Savage Americans to Christianity." This scheme involved the erection of a college at the Bermudas, and the government granted a charter, and promised a grant in aid. Berkeley set out for the Bermudas, but the money not being forthcoming, the scheme had to be abandoned. In 1733, he was made Bishop of Cloyne, when he retired to Oxford. His last publication was a treatise on "The Virtues of Tar Water." Died, 1753.

Berlioz, Hector (bair'le-o), a French composer, was born at La Côte St. André, 1803, and died in 1869. His best productions are the symphonies "Harold" and "Romeo and Juliet."

Bernadotte, Jean Baptiste Jules, a marshal of France, under Napoleon I., born in 1764, was elected King of Sweden and Norway on the death of Charles XIII., assumed the throne under the title of Charles John XIV., and in 1813 commanded the united armies of Germany against Napoleon. Died in 1844, after a wise and prosperous reign.

Bernard, St., born in 1091 of noble Burgundian birth; was educated at Paris University. He entered the Cistercian monastery at Cîteaux, and there acquired a high reputation as a preacher. At the head of a band of monks he was sent to found a new monastery, which he established at Clairvaux, and from which his fame and influence spread far and wide. Kings, popes, and nobles all appealed to him for advice on the weightiest matters, and accepted his decisions. He procured the condemnation of several heterodox writers, including Abelard and Arnold of Brescia. His great work was the preaching of a new crusade in France and Germany. He excited the greatest enthusiasm, and prophesied the triumph of the expedition. But it failed notably, and Bernard died soon afterwards (1153). He was canonized in 1174, and bears the title of "The Last of the Fathers."

Bernardin de St. Pierre (der-sant-pe-are) Jacques Henri, the admired author of "Paul and Virginia," "Studies of Nature," etc., was born at Havre in 1737. He became professor of morals at the normal school, and a member of the institute, and died in 1814.

Bernhardt (Bernard), Rosine Sarah, French tragic actress, was born in Paris, October 22, 1844, of Jewish parents, but, by the will of her father, educated at a convent at Versailles and at the Paris Conservatoire. Appeared at the Théâtre Français in 1862 as "Iphigénie," but without success. In 1867 at the Odéon, in the rôle of the queen, in Victor Hugo's "Ruy Blas," she gained her first striking success. The war of 1870-71 interrupted her career, and she became, for a while, a nurse. She then won a position in the Théâtre Français, the troupe of which she accompanied in 1879 to London, where her triumphs have been repeated in succeeding years, and where she married a M. d'Amala. She was left a widow in 1889. She broke her contract with the Français in 1880, and has since been touring, with great clat in America, and in all the principal countries of Europe. She now directs a theater of her own in Paris. She is also a painter and sculptor. Her "Memoirs" were published by Heinemann in 1907.

Bernini (ber-ne'-ne), Giovanni Lorenzo, known as the Cavaliere Bernini, was born in Naples in 1598. He was eminent as a painter, an architect, and a sculptor; and his merit entitled him to the rewards which he had the good fortune to receive from Louis XIV. His Apollo and Daphne, produced from a single block, when he was but 18 years of age, was considered a masterpiece, but his finest works are found in the colonnade at Rome. He died in 1680.

Bernoulli (ber'-nool-ye), James, a celebrated mathematician, was born in Basil in 1654. He died in 1705. John Bernoulli, brother to James, and not less celebrated as a mathematician, was born in Basil in 1667. He died in 1748. Nicholas Bernoulli was born at Basil in 1687. He became a professor of mathematics at Berlin. He died in 1759. Daniel Bernoulli, son of John, was born in Groningen in 1700. He studied mathematics, and became a professor of anatomy and botany. He died in 1782. John Bernoulli, brother of the last-named, born in Basil in 1710, was a professor of eloquence and mathematics. He died in 1790. James Bernoulli, his son, a licentiate at law, was born in Basil in 1759. Though a lawyer by profession, he studied mathematics with success. He died in 1789.

Berosus (be-ro'-sus), an eminent historian, born in Babylon, was a priest in the temple of Belus, and flourished in the time of Alexander the Great, and in that of several of his successors. His writings are said to have strongly corroborated various parts of Scripture.

Berthier (bare'-te-a), Alexander, Prince, a distinguished French general, born 1753. He received honors from Buonaparte in acknowledgment of his great services, for though he won no battle himself, he largely contributed towards the gaining of many. On the return of Louis XVIII., Berthier sent in his adhesion, and was made captain of the guards of the restored monarch. When Napoleon reappeared, having escaped from Elba, Berthier withdrew to Bamberg with his family, where he terminated his existence by throwing himself from a window, it was supposed, in a fit of apoplexy, in June, 1815.

Berzelius, Johann Jakob, born in 1779, Swedish chemist, was professor for many years at Stockholm University, and acquired a great reputation by his memoirs and his invaluable work in chemical analysis and mineralogy. Died, 1848. Born, 1753.

Bessemer, Sir Henry, civil engineer and inventor, born at Charlton, Herts., in 1813; of his many inventions the chief is the process, named after him, of converting pig-iron into steel at once by blowing a blast of air through the iron while in fusion till everything extraneous is expelled, and only a definite quantity of carbon is left in combination, a process which has revolutionized the iron and steel trade all over the world, leading, as has been calculated, to the production of thirty times as much steel as before and at one-fifth of the cost per ton. Died, 1898.

Bessey, Charles Edwin, professor of botany in University of Nebraska since 1884; born on a farm, in Milton, Wayne County, O., May 21, 1845; graduate (B. Sc.) of Michigan Agricultural College, 1869; studied with Dr. Asa Gray at Harvard, 1872-73 and 1875-76; married, on December 25, 1873, Lucy Athearn, West Tisbury, Martha's Vineyard, Mass. Author: "Geography of Iowa," "Botany for High Schools and Colleges," "The Essentials of Botany," "Elementary Botanical Exercises," "Elementary Botany," "Plant Migration Studies," also many scientific papers and reviews. Edited McNab's "Morphology, Physiology, and Classification of Plants."

Beveridge, Albert Jeremiah, was born on a farm in Highland county, Ohio, October 6, 1862; his father and brothers were soldiers in the Union Army; was graduated at De Pauw University, Greencastle, Ind., in 1885; was admitted to the bar in 1886, and has since then devoted himself to his profession; was married, first, to Miss Katherine M. Langsdale, in 1887, who died in 1900; second, in 1907, to Katherine Eddy, of Chicago; was elected to the Senate of the United States in 1899, for the term beginning March 4 following; was reelected in 1905. He is the author of "The Russian Advance," "The Young Man and the World," and has been a frequent magazine contributor.

Bewick, Thomas, born in 1753; English engraver, entered into partnership with a Newcastle wood engraver, Ralph Beilby, with whom he published his "History of Quadrupeds," which proved an immense success. After some more fine work, he produced "The History of British Birds," and later, "Æsop's Fables," the two best examples of his art. Died, 1828.

Bichat (bē'shā), Marie Francois Xavier, born in 1771; physiologist and anatomist, was adopted by Dessault, whose works he edited, and after his death devoted himself to research in anatomy and surgery with such incessant industry as to undermine his constitution. He left numerous works of the highest value. Died, 1802.

Biddle, John, born in 1615; religious controversialist, known as "the father of the English Unitarians"; was sent to prison for heresy, and his book was ordered by the House of Commons to be burnt. In 1648, for the publication of his "Confession of Faith," he was condemned to death, but the sentence was commuted; and he was released in 1651, only to be again imprisoned by order of the House of Commons. Cromwell subsequently banished him to the Scilly Isles, but in 1662 he returned to London, and was again sent to prison, where he died (1662).

Bierce, Ambrose, author, journalist; born in Ohio, 1842; served as line officer during Civil War; brevetted major for distinguished services; went to California, 1866; went to London, 1872, contributing to "Fun" fables purporting to be translations from Zambri, the Parsee (published in volume, "Cobwebs from an Empty Skull," 1874); returned to California and contributed to "Overland Monthly," edited "Argonaut" and "Wasp"; for many years contributed "Prattle" columns in San Francisco "Examiner." Bishop, Sir Henry Rowley, born in 1786; English composer, early devoted himself to the composition of dramatic music; and in 1809 produced his "Circassian Bride," which was a great success. In 1810 he became connected with Covent Garden Theater, and produced many operas during this time, including "The Lady of the Lake," "Guy Mannering," and "The Slave." In 1825, Bishop broke his connection with Covent Garden to go to Drury Lane, and he was succeeded at the former theater by Weber. It was in rivalry with Weber's "Oberon" that Bishop produced the unsuccessful "Aladdin." In 1840, his last dramatic piece, "The Fortunate Isles," was produced at Covent Garden in honor of the queen's wedding; in 1842, he was knighted; and in 1848 he became professor of music at Oxford. Died, 1855.

Bismarck-Schonhausen, Karl Otto, Prince Von (biz-märk-shoon-hou'zēn), one of the greatest statesmen of the Nineteenth Century, was born in Brandenburg, 1815. After studying law at the universities of Göttingen and Berlin, Bismarck-Schonhausen filled important diplomatic positions, and was nominated prime minister of Prussia in 1862. His reactionary policy gave great offense to, and provoked many collisions with, the Liberal party; and, ere long, he dissolved the Representative Chamber, and declared that the ministry would act independent of popular suffrage. Bismarck-Schonhausen instigated the war against Denmark in 1864, which resulted in the acquisition of the Schleswig-Holstein duchies by Prussia. The rivalry which had long existed between Austria and Prussia, as the leading German powers, was terminated by the latter kingdom seceding from the Bund in 1866, and forming an alliance with Italy against Austria. War was declared in June, and the result of a six weeks' campaign was the exclusion of Austria from German councils and interests. Bismarck-Schonhausen next set about annexing the smaller states of Hanover, Hesse, etc., and succeeded in negotiating a secret treaty, in August, 1866, with the South German powers, by virtue of which their armies were placed under control of the King of Prussia. In 1867, Bismarck-Schonhausen was made chancellor of the German Confederation, and, in 1870, brought about a coalition of the German powers against France, in consequence of a declaration of war having been declared by Napoleon III. against Prussia, on account of her interference in the succession to the Spanish Crown. The German armies crossed the Rhine in August, and, after defeating the French in several obstinately-fought battles, compelled the capitulation of the French Emperor with his army at Sedan, and ultimately besieged Paris, which city capitulated in the early part of 1871. For his services in the successful carrying out of this war, which resulted in the elevation of his master, William I., to the imperial Crown of Germany, Bismarck-Schonhausen was created a prince of the empire in May, 1871. Died, 1898.

Bispham, George Tucker, lawyer, author; born in Philadelphia, May 24, 1838; graduate of University of Pennsylvania, 1858; law department, same, 1862; admitted to bar, 1861; has practiced in Philadelphia ever since; later admitted to bar of United States Supreme Court. He fought in the Danish War, and assisted at the negotiations which brought about peace with the transference of Norway to Sweden. In 1826 he was appointed minister in London. He left several works on political and fiscal matters. Died, 1847.

Bjornson (byern'son), Bjornstjerne, born in 1832, the national poet of Norway. In early life an historical drama of his, called "Valborg," was accepted by the Royal Theater, but its author withdrew the piece. In 1856 the International Students' Reunion at Upsala stimulated him again to an effort to produce a national poetry, free from foreign influences. He began with "Synnöve Solbakken," a story of peasant life, which was followed by "Arne" and many other pieces. In 1858, he became director of the theater at Bergen, and produced quickly two dramas, "Mellem Slagene" and "Halte Hulda," both treating of national subjects. "Marie Stuart" and "Sigurd Slenbe" are both well-known plays, and he has written, besides his dramas, a series of folk plays, an epic, and much beautiful lyric poetry. He receives a government pension, but lives abroad.

Black, Frank Swett, ex-governor of New York; born in Limington, Me., March 8, 1853; graduated at Dartmouth, 1875; was editor Johnstown, N. Y., "Journal"; later reporter Troy, N. Y., "Whig"; clerk in registry department, Troy post-office; admitted to bar, 1879; member of Congress, 1895-97; governor of New York, 1897-99; since when he has been a practicing lawyer.

Black, William, born in 1841; English novelist; spent some years in the study of art, but, regarding himself as a failure in the artistic profession, he turned to literature. His first novel, "Love or Marriage," was published in 1867, being followed in 1868 by "In Silk Attire," and in 1871 by "A Daughter of Heth," which was a pronounced success. "The Strange Adventures of a Phaeton" and "A Princess of Thule" were published soon after, and his reputation as one of the best novelists of the day was established. For four years he acted as assistant-editor of the "Daily News," but abandoned journalism long before his death in 1898.

In 1860, he published for the first time, the work being a poem entitled "The Fate of Franklin." This was followed by translations of the first two of the "Georgics," and in 1864 by his first novel, "Clara Vaughan."

Blackstone (black'-ston), Sir William. A celebrated jurist, born in London in 1723. He was a judge, a member of parliament, and author of "Commentaries on the Laws of England." At the bar, after seven years' practice, his prospects were so indifferent, that he retired to Oxford on his fellowship, and there gave public lectures on English law. Their success is supposed to have suggested to Mr. Viner the propriety of establishing a professorship of law in the university, to which office Blackstone was elected, being the first Vinerian lecturer, in 1758. Subsequently, having married, he vacated his fellowship, and was appointed principal of New-Inn Hall. That office, with his Vinerian professorship, he resigned in 1766. In 1770, he became one of the judges of the Common Pleas. Died, 1780.

Blind, Karl, born in 1820, German revolutionist, began his agitation when still a student, and in 1847 was imprisoned for a short time. He took part in the rising of 1848, and then fled to Alsace, from whence the French Government sent him to Switzerland. He joined Struve in the second Black Forest insurrection, and was condemned to a long term of imprisonment, but was liberated by the people. Being banished from France, and a fugitive from Germany, he went to Belgium, and afterwards to England, where he wrote industriously in support of his political ideas. It was Blind's son-in-law who attempted Bismarck's life in 1866. Died, 1907.

Bloomfield, Robert (bloom'fēld), an English poet; was born in 1766. Reared in humble life, his genius found development in the poem entitled the "Farmer's Boy," which attained very great popularity. Died, 1823.

Blücher, Gerhard Leberecht von, born in 1742. Prussian field marshal and Prince of Wahlstadt, first entered the Swedish, but soon passed to the Prussian army, in which he served during the Seven Years' War. He went through the Polish campaign of 1772, and gained rapid promotion during the struggle with the French invaders begun in 1792. In the campaign of 1814, Blücher held high command, and though defeated by Napoleon, he beat Marshal Marmont, and entered Paris with the Allies. In the Waterloo campaign he commanded the Prussian army in Belgium, and was severely defeated by Napoleon at Ligny. However, by out-maneuvring Grouchy, he was able to arrive at Waterloo in time to decide the victory for the Allies and pursue the routed French army. He then retired from active service and died four years later. Died, 1819.

Boccaccio (bok-kā-tshe-o), Giovanni, a much-admired Italian novelist, born at Paris in 1313. His works are prized for their tenderness, but they often offend decorum. His most celebrated work is the Decameron, a collection of one hundred stories, supposed to have been recited in ten days by a company of ladies and gentlemen, who had withdrawn to the country to escape the plague which raged at Florence in 1348. He died in 1375.

Having studied at Oxford, he entered parliament in 1700, and in 1704 became secretary of war. He afterwards became secretary of state for foreign affairs, and negotiated the Treaty of Utrecht. In 1712, he was raised to the peerage. On the accession of George I. he was impeached of high treason, when he fled the country, and became secretary of state to the first pretender. He was attainted, and his estate seized; but in 1723 he was permitted to return. His estates were restored, but he was not allowed to sit in parliament. He wrote against the ministry, and his productions were admired for their eloquence and vigor. He again withdrew to France in 1735, but returned to England on the death of his father, and died in 1751.

Bolívar, Simon, the founder and first president of the Republic of Colombia, known as "The Liberator of South America." Born in Venezuela, 1783, he was educated in Madrid, and traveled in Europe and the United States. When the revolt against the Spanish yoke broke out in Venezuela, he joined it, but had to fly. In 1813 he returned, and gathering a force together, defeated General Monteverde at Caracas. The tide then turned, and Bolívar fled to Jamaica, but he shortly returned, and after varying fortune in 1819 won the battle of Boyaca, resulting in the inauguration of the Republic of Venezuela in the same year, to which was afterwards united New Granada. In 1822 Bolívar went to help the Peruvians in their struggle for liberty, and was given the chief command. After a long campaign he won the great battle of Ayacucho. Upper Peru was constituted a separate republic with the title of Bolivia. As President of Colombia he had to endure much factious hostility; but though he tendered his resignation more than once it was never accepted, the supreme power being confirmed in him in 1828. Died, 1830.

Bonaparte, Charles Joseph, lawyer, secretary of the navy, United States, since July 1, 1905; born in Baltimore, June 9, 1851; grandson of Jerome Bonaparte, King of Westphalia; graduate of Harvard in 1871; Harvard Law School in 1874; since then in law practice in Baltimore; prominent in reform movements; Republican presidential elector from Maryland, 1904; chairman council of National Civil Service Reform League; president of National Municipal League; member of Executive Committee National Civic Federation; overseer at Harvard, 1891-1903; trustee Catholic University of America since 1904; awarded Laetare medal by University of Notre Dame, 1903. Attorney General of United States, 1905-1909.

Bonapartes, The. The family to which the Emperor Napoleon I. belonged came from Corsica. The father, Carlo Maria Bonaparte, born in 1746, was a lawyer and an adherent of Paoli, the insurgent. Died, 1785. The mother, Letizia Ramolini, born in 1750, was celebrated for her beauty; and with the title, "Madame Mère," lived in Paris during the rule of Napoleon. Died, 1836. (1) Joseph, born in 1768, the eldest son, practiced as an advocate, and married a merchant's daughter at Marseilles. He was commissary-general to the army in Italy under Napoleon, and in 1797 was sent as ambassador to the pope. An able diplomatist, he negotiated the treaties of peace at Lunéville (1801), and at Amiens (1802). When his brother was proclaimed Emperor, he was placed upon the throne of Naples, but being a merely nominal ruler, his good judgment and better instincts had no play. In 1808, he was transferred to the throne of Spain, where his position was still more unfortunate. He was twice compelled to fly from Madrid, and finally abandoned the throne after the battle of Vittoria. He was lieutenant-general of the empire during the 1814 campaigns and the Hundred Days; and after Waterloo he lived for some years in the United States as the Comte de Survilliers. He died in Florence in 1844, and left his highly interesting "Memoirs and Correspondence." (2) Napoleon, the second son. (Napoleon I.) (3) Lucien, born in 1775, in 1795 became commissary to the army of the North. In 1798, he was elected to the council of the Five Hundred, and played an important part in the revolution which destroyed the Directory and made Napoleon First Consul. After becoming minister of the interior, he went as ambassador to Madrid; but his marriage with Mme. Joubert brought about an estrangement between him and the emperor, and in 1804 he retired to his estates in Italy, as Prince of Canino, where he cultivated his tastes for literature and the fine arts. After the peace of Tilsit he was offered the crown of Italy, but he refused it; and in 1810 set out for the United States. Captured by a British cruiser, he was kept a prisoner in England till 1814. After Waterloo he induced Napoleon to abdicate in favor of his son; and he himself retired to Italy. He wrote an epic, "Charlemagne." Died, 1840. (4) Marie Anne Elisa, born in 1777, married Felix Pascal Baciocchi, and was created Princess of Piombino and Lucca, and Grand Duchess of Tuscany. She retired from France in 1815, and died in Trieste in 1820. (5) Louis, born in 1778, the father of Napoleon III. He served in the Italian and Egyptian campaigns; and in 1802 he was compelled to marry Hortense Beauharnais, from whom he was afterwards separated. Under the empire he was created a prince and constable of France, and after occupying Holland he was proclaimed king of the country. He became extremely popular with the people, but offended the emperor, and in 1810 he abdicated, the country being absorbed in France. He spent most of his life after Napoleon's banishment in Italy, and wrote several books, of which the "Documents Historiques" is the most important. Died, 1846. (6) Marie Pauline. (Pauline Borghese.) (7) Caroline Marie Annonciade, born in 1782, married Marshal Murat in 1800. Died, 1839. (8) Jérôme, born in 1784. He was given a command in the navy, and while on the American station married a Miss Paterson, a marriage which he was forced to renounce by the emperor. In 1806 he was made king of Westphalia, and married a daughter of the King of Württemberg, who became the mother of Prince Napoleon. In 1812 he proved so incapable a general during the Russian campaign that he was removed from command; but he commanded a division at Waterloo. After Napoleon's abdication he lived in exile, until 1847, when Napoleon III. made him a marshal of France and president of the senate. Died, 1860. Of the second generation: (1) Napoleon, son of Louis. (Napoleon III.) (2) Napoleon, Joseph, born in 1822, commonly known as Prince Napoleon, and son of Jérôme Bonaparte. His early life was spent in travel, but after the 1848 revolution he was elected to the assembly. In 1849, he held for a year the post of ambassador at Madrid; and in 1854 he commanded a division of the army in the Crimea. He threw up his command suddenly, and in 1858 became president of the ministry for Algiers. In 1859, he held a command in Italy, and married the Princess Clotilde, a daughter of Victor Emmanuel. In 1861, he created a sensation in the senate by a fine oration in support of Democratic principles, provoking a challenge from the Duc d'Aumale. His loudly-expressed approval of the Polish revolution brought him into disgrace with the emperor more than once, and compelled his resignation of the presidency of the Commissioners for the Universal Exhibition. After the fall of Napoleon III., and the death of Prince Louis Napoleon, he was recognized as head of the Napoleon family. In 1883, he was imprisoned for a pronunciamiento, and in 1886 he was banished from France, and died in exile in 1891. (3) Charles Lucien Jules, Prince de Canino, born in 1803, the son of Lucien Bonaparte, a distinguished naturalist; in 1822, married his cousin, Zenaide, the daughter of Jérôme Bonaparte, and soon after went to America, where he devoted himself to the study of science, and published his valuable "American Ornithology." In 1828, he returned to Italy; in 1833 he published his "Italian Fauna," and in 1847 he succeeded to the title of prince. He was for a short time active in Italian politics, but finally settled at Paris, where he died in 1857.

His son, Lucien, born in 1828, is a cardinal. (4) Louis Lucien, born in 1813, the second son of Lucien Bonaparte. He passed his youth in scientific and linguistic study. In 1848, he was elected to the constituent assembly as deputy for Corsica, but the election was annulled. In 1852, he was made a senator, and in 1860 grand officer of the Legion of Honor. He has written a great deal, much of his work being translations. Died, 1891. (3) Pierre Napoleon, prince, born in 1815, third son of Lucien. After getting into disfavor in Italy and America, he went to Paris in 1848, and sat in the assembly. In 1849 he served in Algeria, and finally settled in England. Died, 1851. Of the third generation: Prince Louis, better known as the Prince Imperial, born in 1856, the only child of Napoleon III. and the Empress Eugénie. He accompanied his father at the opening of the Franco-German War, but after Sedan he went to England. He entered the Woolwich Military Academy, and in 1879 went with the expedition to Zululand. He was killed in this war, a small body of soldiers with whom he had gone out having been surprised by the Zulus. A monument was erected to his memory at Chislehurst. Died, 1879.

Bonheur, Rosa (bō-nōr'), a French painter, born at Bordeaux, 1822; is unrivaled among her own sex for the minute and spirited delineation of the various forms of animal life. Her most celebrated pieces are "The Nivernais Ploughing," "The Horse-Fair," "The Three Musketeers," and "Cows and Sheep in a Hollow Road." Through the Empress Eugénie, she received the Cross of the Legion of Honor. During the siege of Paris, her studio was spared by order of the Crown Prince. Died, 1899.

Boniface, Saint, born in 680, an English monk, known as the "Apostle of Germany," abandoned certain and distinguished preferment to go in 716 as a missionary to Germany. Having obtained authority from Pope Gregory II., he lived among the barbarous tribes for many years, and finally met a martyr's death near Utrecht. Died, 755.

Boone, Daniel (boon), the pioneer of Kentucky, born in Bucks County, Pennsylvania, 1735, was one of the most successful of the enterprising American pioneers of the Eighteenth Century. He died in 1820.

Borghese (bōr-gā'zā). The name of a family of high position and great wealth in Rome. Camillo, having become pope, in 1605, under the title of Paul V.; and Prince Borghese having married Pauline Bonaparte, sister of Napoleon, who separated himself from her on the fall of her brother. He was born in 1775; died, 1832. The palace of the family is one of the finest in Rome, and has a rich collection of paintings.

Borgia, Cæsare, born in 1476, Italian master of statecraft of great but evil fame, was the fourth son of Pope Alexander VI., by Rosa Vanozza, and was created a cardinal, though he divested himself of the office in later years to suit his purposes. He compassed the death of his brother Giovanni, who was Duke of Candia, in order to gain complete ascendancy in the papal government; and in 1498, having been sent as nuncio to Louis XII. of France, he was created Duke of Valentinois and married the daughter of Jean d'Albret, King of Navarre. After accompanying Louis XII.'s Italian campaign, he conceived the idea of a kingdom in Central Italy, and by force, treachery, and murder he had nearly succeeded in obtaining ascendancy throughout the Roman states, when the death of his father deprived him of his great source of power. He was sent in 1504 a prisoner to Spain by Pope Julius II., but escaped, and joined the King of Navarre's army against Castile. In this campaign he was killed in 1507.

Borgia Lucrezia, born in 1480, sister of the preceding, and like him the possessor of an infamous reputation. Her father compelled her twice to marriage and divorce before she became the wife of the Duke of Bisceglia. After her third husband had been murdered by Cæsare Borgia, she married Alfonso of Este, and passed her life in the court of Ferrara, cultivating literature and art. Died, 1519.

Borgiano (bor-je-ä'-no), Horazio, an artist of eminence, a painter of historical subjects, of portraits, and also an engraver, was born in Rome in 1630. His style was considered masterly, and his "Dead Christ," a composition wholly his own, was especially admired. He died in 1681.

Exhibited as painter and sculptor in Paris Salon; in Spain, 1892; in California, 1893-94; returned East, and in 1896 went to London, remaining until 1901; settled in New York since 1902. Exhibited in London and Paris, 1896-1901; held successful "one-man" exhibition in London; received gold medal sculpture at Louisiana Purchase Exposition; sculptor for work on Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York. Work includes, in painting, figures and animals, portraits and mural painting; in sculpture figures and horses and groups in bronze; executed the gargoyles on the Princeton Dormitory. class of 1879 (about sixty devices).

Borromeo, St. Carlo (bör-rō-mā'-ō), cardinal and archbishop of Milan, a prominent member of the Council of Trent, contributed to the Tridentine Catechism, and was conspicuous by his self-sacrificing offices during a plague in the city of which he was the archbishop. Born in 1538, died in 1584.

Bossuet (bo-swā'), Jacques Benigne, born in Dijon, France, September 27, 1627; a distinguished orator and prelate of the Roman Catholic Church, bishop successively of Cordan and of Meaux, and tutor to the Dauphin, the son of Louis XIV. Bossuet was the author of several controversial works, all in defense of the Roman Catholic doctrine; but his fame rests chiefly on his "Sermons," which, of their kind, are of unrivaled eloquence, though they are too dramatic for the majority of English readers. Several of his compositions, written in the first instance for the use of the Dauphin, and especially his "Discourse on Universal History," printed in 1681, long retained a high reputation. Died, 1704.

Boswell, James, the biographer of Johnson, born in Edinburgh, showed early a penchant for writing and an admiration for literary men. He fell in with Johnson on a visit to London in 1763, and conceived for him the most devoted regard; made a tour with him to the Hebrides in 1773, the "Journal" of which he afterwards published; settled in London, and was called to the English bar; succeeded, in 1782, to his father's estate, Auchinleck, in Ayrshire, with an income of £1,600 a year. Johnson dying in 1784, Boswell's "Life" of him appeared five years after, a work unique in biography, and such as no man could have written who was not a hero-worshiper to the backbone. He succumbed in the end to intemperate habits, aggravated by the death of his wife. Born in 1740, died in 1795.

Bothwell (both'-wel), James Hepburn, Earl. The head of a powerful family in East Lothian. He became the second husband of Mary, Queen of Scots, having compassed the death, as was generally believed, of Darnley, her first husband. By Mary he was created Duke of Orkney, but a confederacy of nobles having compelled him to leave Scotland, he engaged in piratical enterprises, was taken by the Danes, and died in confinement in 1578. Born, 1536.

Botta, Carlo Giuseppe Guglielmo, born in 1766, Italian historian, studied medicine, and was imprisoned in 1792 as a revolutionary. He took an active part in the government of Piedmont, set up by Napoleon, but before the emperor's overthrow he devoted himself entirely to literature. He wrote "The History of Italy between 1789 and 1814," and a "History of the American War of Independence." Died, 1837.

Botticelli (bot-tē-chel'-lē), Alessandro, born in 1447. Italian painter, in response to the invitation of Pope Sixtus IV. went to Rome and executed some fine paintings for the chapel of the Vatican. On returning to Florence he became a devoted follower of Savonarola. Died, 1515.

Boughton, George Henry, born in 1833, artist, a member of the National Academy of New York, and an associate of the Royal Academy since 1879. Among his paintings are "The Return of the Mayflower," "Evangeline," and "Milton visited by Andrew Marvell."

Bouguereau (bög-ro') Adolphe Guillaume, born in 1825; French painter. In 1855 his "Triomphe du Martyre" was bought by the state, and previously he divided the honors of the Grand Prix du Rome with Baudry. Two of his later pictures which are well-known are "The Youth of Bacchus" and the "Adoration of the Magi and the Shepherds."

Boulanger (bö-lon-zhā'), George Ernest Jean Marie, born in 1837. French general and politician, was made colonel during the siege of Paris, general of brigade in 1880, and minister of war in 1886. He achieved great popularity, and was elected in 1889 by the Nord, Somme, Charente Inférieure, and a division of Paris. A threat of prosecution drove him into exile, and he committed suicide at Brussels. Died, 1891.

Bowles, Samuel, a distinguished American journalist; was born at Springfield, Mass., February 9, 1826, and from 1844 until his death in 1878 was editor of the "Springfield Republican," founded by his father. Under his management the paper became one of the foremost journals in the country, and is now noted for its comprehensive news, its literary taste, and its intelligent views of public affairs. In recent years it has labored to free the press from the bias of political party. Bowles is author of "Across the Continent," "Our New West," and "The Switzerland of America."

Braddock, Edward, born in 1695, British general; served in the Peninsula and Germany, and in 1754 was appointed to the command of the forces in Virginia. In 1755 he led an expedition against Fort Du Quesne, where his troops fell into an ambush and were routed, and himself killed. Died, 1755.

Braddon, Mary Elizabeth, born in 1837, popular novelist, after contributing to the provincial press, succeeded in getting a comedy, "Loves of Arcadia," accepted at the Strand Theater. In 1861 she produced a volume of poems, "Garibaldi," and then turning to fiction, published rapidly "Lady Lisle," "Lady Audley's Secret," "Aurora Floyd," and "Henry Dunbar." These books established her as one of the most popular novelists of the day, and later works, which she has published in large number, have not diminished her reputation.

Bradlaugh, Charles, born in 1833, politician, after working in several humble capacities, enlisted in the army. In 1853 he entered a solicitor's office; and then he achieved a great influence with working men as a Radical, and an antagonist of the Christian religion. His lectures in the Hall of Science, London, on social, political, and religious questions, were very popular; and in 1860 he started the "National Reformer," against which a futile government prosecution was instituted. In 1870, he secured a judicial decision in favor of affirmation in courts of law, but the expenses of the trial made him bankrupt. In 1872, he published his "Impeachment of the House of Brunswick," and the question of perpetual pensions always formed one of his favorite subjects. In 1880, he was returned for Northampton to Parliament, but refusing to take the oath, he was not allowed to take his seat until after the general election of 1885, although he was repeatedly returned by the constituency. Afterwards he earned a high reputation in the House of Commons, and though a thorough Radical, opposed the advocates of socialism. In 1889, he visited India, his interest in Indian affairs having always been pronounced. Died, 1891.

Lexicon. Editor: "International Theological Library," "International Critical Commentary."

Bright, John, born November 16, 1811; an eminent orator and Radical statesman. Of Quaker parentage, he entered his father's business at the age of 16. Though he had taken part in the Reform movement, he first became prominent along with his friend Cobden in the anti-corn law agitation; entered parliament for Durham, being afterwards returned for Manchester, and losing that seat through his opposition to the Crimean War. In 1857, he was returned for Birmingham, holding that seat till his death. He joined Mr. Gladstone's government which disestablished the Irish Church, but opposed his Home Rule policy in 1886, dying in the unshaken conviction that it was a fatal error. As a master of really pure Saxon English, in all its power and pathos, Mr. Bright was never surpassed, and his speeches are worthy attentive study on that account alone. Died, March 27, 1889.

Brock, Sir Isaac, a gallant British officer. In 1812, when an American army, under General Hull, invaded Canada, the measures adopted by Brock were so effectual that the Americans surrendered without striking a blow. He did not long enjoy the fame he had won. An affair occurred at Queenstown, in October the same year, in which he lost his life.

Bronte, Charlotte, born in 1816; English authoress, the eldest of the three Brontë sisters. After some experience as a governess she became engaged with her sisters in the writing of novels, and in 1846 published with them a small volume of poems under the names of Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell. In 1847 she published the well-known story, "Jane Eyre." Its success was instantaneous and complete. Although adversely and severely criticised, it was and is admitted to be one of the most remarkable of English novels. Her second story, "Shirley," was published in 1849, and her third and last, "Villette," in 1853. Another story, "The Professor," which had been refused by the publisher before "Jane Eyre" had made its authoress famous, was published after her death. In June, 1854, she married the Rev. Mr. Nicholls, who had been for a time her father's curate. But soon after her marriage, consumption, which had carried off her sisters and brothers, settled on her, and she died in her fortieth year (1855).

Brooke, Rev. Stopford A., M. A., was born in 1832. Educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he graduated (1856), winning the Downe prize and Vice-Chancellor's medal for English verse. He was formerly chaplain to Queen Victoria and to the Empress Frederick of Germany. In 1880, Mr. Brooke seceded from the Church of England because he could not accept the orthodox views on miracles, and became minister of Bedford Chapel, Bloomsbury. In 1895, however, after a lengthy illness, he found himself compelled to retire from the post. He is the author of several works, among which are "Life and Letters of the Late F. W. Robertson," a "Primer of English Literature," "The Early Life of Jesus," several volumes of sermons, a volume of poems, "History of English Poetry," a work on "Early English Literature," "The Old Testament and Modern Life," and a book on Browning.

Brougham, Henry, Lord Brougham and Vaux (brōō'ām), born in Edinburgh in 1778, and educated at the high school and university of that city, was admitted to the Scotch bar in 1800. Excluded from promotion in Scotland by his liberal principles, he joined the English bar in 1808, speedily acquired a reputation as a lawyer for the defense in Crown libel actions, and, by his eloquence in the cause of Queen Caroline, 1820. Died, 1868.

Brown, Henry Billings, associate justice of United States Supreme Court, 1891-1906; born in South Lee, Mass., March 2, 1836; graduate of Yale, 1856; studied law in private office; attended lectures at Yale and Harvard law schools. Deputy United States marshal, 1861-63; assistant United States attorney for eastern district of Michigan, 1863-68; then for a few months, to fill a vacancy, judge State Circuit Court of Wayne County; practiced law in Detroit until 1875; United States judge for eastern district of Michigan, 1875-90. Compiler of Brown's Admiralty Reports.

Brown, John, an American slavery abolitionist, born in 1800, settled in Kansas, and resolutely opposed the project of making it a slave State. In the interest of emancipation, with six others, he seized on the State armory at Harper's Ferry in hope of a rising, entrenched himself armed in it, was surrounded, seized, tried, and hanged in 1859.

Brown-Sequard, Edward, born in 1818; American physician and physiologist, was appointed successively professor of pathology at Harvard, professor to the Faculty of Medicine at Paris, and succeeded Claude

Bernard in the chair of experimental medicine at the College of France. He published two important series of lectures on the "Paralysis of the Lower Extremities" and on "Functional Agitations." Died, 1894.

Browne, Charles Farrar, a humorist and satirist, known by the pseudonym of "Artemus Ward," was born in Maine, United States, in 1834. His first literary effort was as "showman" to an imaginary traveling menagerie. He traveled over America lecturing, carrying with him a whimsical panorama as affording texts for his numerous jokes, which he took with him to London, and exhibited with the same accompaniment with unbounded success. Browne spent some time among the Mormons, and defined their religion as singular, but their wives plural. Died, 1867.

Browne, Sir Thomas, a physician and religious thinker, born in London in 1605, resided at Norwich for nearly half a century, and died there in 1682. He was knighted by Charles II.; "was," Professor Saintsbury says, "the greatest prose writer perhaps, when all things are taken together, in the whole range of English." His principal works are "Religio Medici," "Inquiries into Vulgar Errors," and "Hydriotaphia, or Urn-Burial, a Discourse of the Sepulchral Urns Found in Norfolk," all of the very first importance in English literature.

Browning, Elizabeth Barrett (broun'ing), one of the greatest of English poetesses, born in 1806; she married the poet Robert Browning, with whom she took up her residence in Italy. Her principal works are "Aurora Leigh," "Lady Geraldine's Courtship," "Caso Guidi Windows," and "Poems Before Congress." Died, 1861.

Browning, Robert, an English poet, born in 1812; married Elizabeth Barrett in 1846, and afterward resided in Paris and Italy. His poems are numerous and of much power, but notable for their obscurity. Died, 1889.

Bruce, David, born in 1323; King of Scotland, and son and successor of Robert Bruce. The invasion of Scotland by Edward III. forced him to fly to France; but he returned during the war between France and England. He invaded England, but was defeated and taken prisoner. He was ransomed for £100,000. Died, 1370.

Bruce, Edward, brother of Robert Bruce, fought with great bravery in the war against the English, and in 1315, being offered the crown of Ireland, he went to that country, maintaining his position with great success. He was killed in a battle against the English in 1318.

Brumm'el, Beau, born in London, in 1778; in his day the prince of dandies, was patronized by the Prince of Wales, afterwards George IV.; quarreled with the prince; fled from his creditors to Calais, where, reduced to destitution, he lived some years in the same reckless fashion. He settled at length in Caen, where he died insane in 1840.

Brutus, Decimus Junius Albinus, one of the assassins of Julius Cæsar. After the murder of the consul, he was besieged in Mutina by Mark Antony, but drove off the enemy. Crossing into Macedonia, he was betrayed into the hands of Antony and put to death (43 B. C.).

Brutus, Lucius Junius, a Roman consul. Tarquinius Superbus, having put the father and brother of Brutus to death, Brutus feigned madness, until the rape of Lucretia, when he excited the populace to insurrection, and drove Tarquinius from the city. He and Collatinus were appointed consuls together, and in this capacity Brutus ordered the execution of his own sons for complicity in a conspiracy. He was killed by Tarquinius's son. Died, 501 B. C.

Brutus, Marcus Junius, born in 85 B. C.; the nephew of Cato of Utica, sided with Pompey against Cæsar, and after the battle of Pharsalia retired to literary pursuits. Cæsar made him governor of Cisalpine Gaul, but he joined the conspirators who murdered the consul. After the assassination he collected troops in Macedonia, and assuming the title of emperor, ravaged Rhodes and Lydia. In 42 B. C., he and Cassius were defeated by Octavius Cæsar and Mark Antony, when Brutus committed suicide.

Buddha (bö'd'da), "the wise or enlightened," is the sacred name of the founder of Buddhism, who appears to have lived in the Sixth Century B. C. He was born a Hindu, of an intensely contemplative nature, the son of a king, who did everything in his power to tempt him from a religious life, from which, however, in his contemplation of the vanity of existence nothing could detain him; retired into solitude at the age of 30, as Sakyamuni, i. e., solitary of the Sakyas, his tribe; consulted religious books, could get no good out of them, till, by-and-by, he abstracted himself more and more from everything external, when at the end of ten years, as he sat brooding under the Bo-tree alone with the universe, soul with soul, the light of truth rose full-orbed upon him, and he called himself henceforth and gave himself out as Buddha. "Now," he said to himself, "I know it all," as Mohammed in his way did after him, and became a preacher to others of what had proved salvation to himself, which he continued to do for forty years, leaving behind him disciples, who went forth without sword, like Christ's, to preach what they, like Christ's, believed was a gospel to every creature.

Buffon (boof'-fong), Georges Louis Leclerc, Count de, an eminent French naturalist, a member of the French Academy, and of that of sciences; was born in 1707. His "Natural History," which appeared in 1749, gave him fame, combining in an eminent degree reason, eloquence, and research. Other works from his pen obtained great applause. He professed to be a materialist. In 1739, he was named Intendant of the Jardin Royal des Plantes. Died, 1788.

Bull, Ole Bornemann, famous violinist; born in Bergen, in Norway, 1810; he secured great triumphs both throughout Europe and in America by his wonderful playing. He lost all his money in a scheme to found a colony of his countrymen in Pennsylvania, and had to take again to his violin to repair his broken fortunes. He afterwards settled down at Cambridge, Mass., and had also a summer residence in Norway, where he died in 1880.

Buller, Sir Redvers, born in 1839; soldier, first saw service in the China War of 1860. In 1870 he took part in the Red River expedition, and in 1874 in the Ashantee War. In 1879 he was sent on special service to the Cape, held command of the Frontier Light Horse in the Kaffir War of 1878-79, and served with great gallantry in the Zulu War. He was present at Tel-el-Kebir, at El Teb and Tamai, and accompanied the Nile expedition of 1884. In 1890, he succeeded Lord Wolseley as adjutant-general. Was prominent in the Boer War. Died, 1908.

Bulow, Friedrich Wilhelm von, born in 1755; Prussian general, obtained field marshal's rank in 1813, and by the victory at Lukan saved Berlin from the French. His victories at Grossbeeren and Dennewitz over Oudinot and Ney respectively twice again saved the Prussian capital at critical moments. He was present at Leipzig, and in command of the right wing of the allies he occupied the low countries. In 1814 he marched into France, and he was in command during the Waterloo campaign. Died in 1816.

Bunyan, John (bun'yān), author of the celebrated allegories, "Pilgrim's Progress," and "Holy War"; born in England, 1628, was when young dissipated, but in early manhood reformed and joined the Baptists, becoming so zealous as to invite persecution. He was sentenced to transportation on a charge of promoting seditious assemblies, but sentence was not enforced; was, however, imprisoned for more than twelve years, and during that time wrote his "Pilgrim's Progress." Died 1688.

Burbank, Luther, naturalist, originator of new fruits and flowers; born in Lancaster, Mass., March 7, 1849; boyhood on farm; educated at Lancaster Academy; always devoted to study of nature, especially plant life. Moved to Santa Rosa, Cal., 1875; conducts Burbank's Experiment Farms. Burke, Edmund, born in 1729; statesman and orator; an Irishman by birth; graduated at Trinity College, Dublin. Going to London, he attracted attention by his essays on the "Sublime and Beautiful," and devoted himself to literature, founding in 1759 "The Annual Register." In 1761 he became private secretary to Hamilton, the new chief secretary for Ireland; and served Lord Rockingham in the same capacity when that nobleman became prime minister. He was returned to Parliament for Wendover, and his speeches on American affairs created a great sensation in the House of Commons. His position in political life was raised still higher by the pamphlets which he wrote on current questions. Returned for Malton, he produced in 1780 his great plan of economical reform; and in 1782 he became paymaster under Lord Rockingham's government. He again took office in the Duke of Portland's coalition ministry, when he made his famous speech on the India bill. In the impeachment of Warren Hastings Burke played a leading part, his opening speech extending over four days. The outbreak of the French Revolution was the occasion of one of his finest efforts of oratory. Burke's attitude in this matter severed his friendship with Fox, and he seceded from the Whig party. In 1794, he retired from parliamentary life, though he continued to produce his pamphlets on political affairs. Died, 1797.

Burleigh (bur'le), William Cecil, Lord, prime minister of England during the reign of Elizabeth; born in 1520, was regarded as one of the ablest statesmen of his time. Died, 1598.

Burlingame (bur'ling-ām), Anson, an American diplomatist; born in Chenango County, N. Y., 1820. He was elected member of Congress by the Republicans of the fifth district of Massachusetts, in 1854-56-58. In 1861, he was sent as minister to China, and, in 1867, appointed ambassador from China to the United States and to the great powers of Europe. In 1868 he visited this country at the head of a Chinese embassy, and concluded a liberal treaty between the United States and China, which was promptly ratified by the Chinese Government. The embassy afterwards visited London, Paris, Berlin, and lastly St. Petersburg, where Burlingame suddenly died, February, 1870.

Burns, Robert, born in 1759; Scottish poet; was the son of an Ayrshire farmer, and with his brothers worked on the farm. His first volume of poems was published in 1786, and attracted much attention, Burns being invited to Edinburgh and made much of by literary society. At this time he was on the point of emigrating to Jamaica. In 1788 he married Jean Armour, and in 1789 became an excise officer, as well as a farmer in Dumfriesshire. In 1791, farming not being profitable, he removed to Dumfries, where he continued his post in the excise, and wrote poems for the Edinburgh publishers. The irregularities which had marked his earlier life returned in his later days, and accelerated his death in 1796.

Burnside, Ambrose Everett, born in 1824; general in the United States Army, early distinguished himself in border warfare, and in the Civil War was present at the battles of Bull Run, South Mountain, and Antietam. He was defeated by the Confederates at Petersburg, but held command of the ninth army corps, under Grant, until Lee's surrender. Died, 1881.

Burr, Aaron, born in 1756; a vice-president of the United States, distinguished himself in the War of Independence. In 1807 he was arrested on a charge of conspiracy. It was supposed that he aimed to separate the Western States from the Union and annex them to Mexico, but he was acquitted. Going to Europe, he was ordered to leave England for endeavoring to promote a filibustering expedition against Mexico. He returned to America in 1812, and spent the rest of his life in retirement. Died, 1836.

Stockbridge, deceased; re-elected for term 1899-1905, and re-elected for term 1905-1911, by unanimous vote of the legislature.

Burton, Theodore E., congressman, lawyer; born in Jefferson, O., December 20, 1851; son of Rev. William and Elizabeth (Grant) Burton; graduate of Oberlin College, 1872; admitted to bar, 1875; since then in practice at Cleveland; member Congress, 1889-91, and 1895-1909, twenty-first Ohio district, Republican; United States senator, 1909. President Grant Family Association of the United States. Author: "Financial Crises and Periods of Industrial and Commercial Depression."

Butler, Benjamin Franklin, an American politician, born in New Hampshire, 1818, studied law and settled in Massachusetts, where he became recognized as the leading Democrat of New England. A delegate to the Charleston and Baltimore nominating conventions, he took a leading part in the movement which nominated Breckenridge and divided the party. He promptly entered the service at the outbreak of the Civil War, and had command of the departments of the Gulf and of the South Atlantic, acquiring no military fame but great notoriety for his arbitrary civil regulations. Elected to Congress by the Massachusetts Republicans in 1866 and 1868, but defeated in 1874, he deserted that party, and in 1882 was elected governor by the Democrats; renominated in 1883, he was defeated. Died, 1893.

Butler, Samuel, born in 1612; English satirist; in his seventeenth year became attached to the household of the Earl of Kent, when he frequently attended meetings at the house of a Sir Samuel Luke, a strict Puritan and Parliamentarian. The experiences of this time furnished him with the material for his famous work, "Hudibras," the first part of which appeared in 1663, and achieved the widest popularity. Two other parts of the work appeared at intervals, but of Butler's life during that time little is known. Died, 1680.

Byron, George Gordon, sixth lord; an English poet; was born in London, 1788; son of Captain Byron of the Guards and Catherine Gordon of Gight, Aberdeenshire. He spent his boyhood at Aberdeen, under his mother, and was educated at Harrow and Cambridge, spending, when at the latter, his vacations in London, where his mother had taken a house. He wrote "Hours of Idleness," a poor first attempt, which called forth a severe criticism in the "Edinburgh Review," and which he satirized in "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," and soon afterwards left England and spent two years in foreign travel; wrote first part of "Childe Harold," "awoke one morning and found himself famous"; produced the "Glaour," "Bride of Abydos," "Hebrew Melodies," and other works. In his school days he had fallen in love with Mary Chaworth, but she had not returned his affection, and in 1815 he married Miss Millbank, an heiress, who in a year left him never to return, when a storm raised against him on account of his private life, drove him from England, and he never came back. On the Continent, moved from place to place, he finished "Childe Harold," completed several short poems, and wrote "Don Juan"; threw himself into revolutionary movements in Italy and Greece, risked his all in the emancipation of the latter, and embarking in it, died at Missolonghi, in 1824, in a fit, at the age of 36. His poems, from the character of the passion that breathed in them, made a great impression on his age.

Cable, George Washington, author; born in New Orleans, October 12, 1844; educated in public schools. Served Fourth Mississippi Cavalry, Confederate States Army, 1863-65; clerk in cotton factor's office; for a time reporter on "New Orleans Picayune," 1865-79; wrote stories for "Scribner's Monthly"; since 1879 devoted to literature. Cæsar, Caius Julius, the greatest of Roman generals. Elected consul 60 B. C.; formed a secret alliance with Pompey and Crassus known as the first triumvirate. Beginning the Gallic War in 58 B. C., he subdued in the course of one campaign both the Helvetii and the Germans under Ariovistus. Pompey having become his enemy through jealousy, Cæsar crossed the Rubicon 49 B. C., and in a short time became master of Italy; having conquered all his enemies, and subdued Spain and Africa, he was made dictator for life, and received from the senate the title of Imperator. Although beloved by the masses, the patricians feared and hated him, and the result of a conspiracy of Cassius, Brutus and others was his assassination. 100-44 B. C.

Caine, Hall, was born of Manx parentage in 1853, and commenced his career as an architect in Liverpool; then joined the staff of the "Liverpool Mercury," and wrote in the "Academy" and the "Athenæum." Resided with Dante Rossetti in London till the poet's death in 1882. Published "Sonnets of Three Centuries," "Recollections of Rossetti," "The Shadow of a Crime," "A Son of Hagar," "The Deemster," "The Bondman," "The Scapegoat," "The Manxman," "The Christian," "The Eternal City," and "The Prodigal Son," which was published in nine different languages on the same day. Many of his later novels have been dramatized successfully. He was elected to the Manx House of Keys in 1901, and to the British Parliament.

Caird, The Rev. John, born in 1820; principal of Glasgow University; an eloquent preacher of the Scotch Established Church; has published sermons and "An Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion" (1880), which shows the influence of Hegel. Died, 1898.

Cairnes, John Elliott, born in 1824; professor of political economy at Queen's College, Galway, and afterwards at University College, London; wrote "The Logical Method of Political Economy," and other treatises marked by severe precision of argument. Died, 1875.

Calderon de la Barca, Don Pedro, born in 1600; Spanish dramatist, educated at the Jesuit College at Madrid, and the University of Salamanca. His mind early assumed a religious cast, first shown in the drama "La Devocion de la Cruz," written at the age of 18. While serving against the Milanese in the Low Countries he wrote the "Siege of Breda," and on the death of Lope de Vega, in 1635, became the leading poet in Spain. In 1651 he took holy orders, and thenceforward wrote little else than sacred dramas, or "autos." Died, 1681.

Calhoun, John Caldwell, born in 1782; American lawyer and statesman, effected great reforms as secretary of war, in 1817 and in 1825 became Vice-President of the United States. He advocated slavery and the dissolution of the Union. Died, 1850.

Caligula (ka-lig'-u-la), the son of Germanicus and Agrippina, was born in A. D. 12. He was named by Tiberius joint heir of the empire. He subsequently became sole emperor, and proved a great tyrant. In the course of a career of incestuous debauchery and degrading voluptuousness, he conceived such a hatred to his subjects, that he openly expressed a wish that the Roman people had but a single neck, in order that he might extirpate them at a blow. He was murdered in 41.

Calvin, John, born in Noyon, France, in 1509; educated at the colleges of La Marche and Montaigu, Paris, held some livings, but preferring the law, he did not proceed to priest's orders. While studying law at Bourges he learned Greek, and on reading the New Testament became a Protestant. He removed to Paris, and wrote a commentary on Seneca's "De Clementia," but, forced by persecution to leave France, took refuge in Basle. In 1536 appeared his "Institutions of the Christian Religion." In conjunction with Farel he attempted to establish a kind of theocracy at Geneva, but they were expelled by the council in 1538, and retired to Zurich. Passing on to Strasburg, Calvin became pastor to the French refugees, married, and published his "Romans." In 1541, Calvin was invited back to Geneva. The theocratic government was resumed, and here he labored till his death. Calvin did more than any other man towards formulating the doctrines of the Reformed Church. The opinions on predestination and election called "Calvinistic," are rather those of his disciples than his own. Died, 1564.

Cambaceres (kam-bă-sare'-ez), Jean Jacques, Duke of Parma, was born in Montpellier in 1753. He was brought up to the legal profession, and became president of the French Convention in 1792. He voted for pronouncing Louis XVI. guilty, but denied the right of the Convention to proceed to the last extremity, and wished that the unfortunate monarch might be detained in prison, and only put to death in case of invasion. He was afterwards president of the Committee of Public Safety, and of the Council of Five Hundred. When Napoleon Bonaparte was named first, Cambacères was made second consul. During the hundred days after Bonaparte's return, he was president of the Chamber of Peers. He left France when the Bourbons were a second time restored, but was permitted to return. Died, 1824.

Cambyses (kam-by'-seez), the son of Cyrus, King of the Persians, succeeded his father in 529 B. C. He conquered Cyprus and Egypt. At Memphis, he caused the bull Aphis to be slaughtered by his priests, and leaving Egypt to return to Persia, he died at Ecbatana of a wound he had received from his own sword when mounting his horse, in 522 B. C.

Camoens, Luiz de (kăm'o-ênz), the greatest of Portuguese poets, was born about 1524. After serving in an expedition against the Moors, in which he lost his right eye, he sailed for India, 1553, where he wrote the "Lusiad" the great poem on which his fame rests. On his return from exile, he suffered shipwreck, and lost all his property excepting the manuscript of his epic. Died at Lisbon, in a hospital, 1580.

Campbell, Alexander, founder of the sect known as the "Disciples of Christ"; born near Ballymena, in County Antrim, Ireland, September 12, 1788. He emigrated to the United States in 1807. Though at first a Presbyterian, in 1812 he formed a connection with the Baptists, and for some time he labored as an itinerant preacher. In 1826 he published a translation of the New Testament, in which the words "baptism" and "baptist" gave place to "immersion" and "immerser." By his discussions on public platforms, and his serial publications, as well as his assiduity in preaching tours and training young men for the ministry, Campbell gradually formed a large party of followers, who began about 1827 to form themselves into a sect under the designation of "The Disciples of Christ." In 1841, Campbell founded Bethany College in West Virginia, where he died, March 4, 1866.

Campbell, Thomas, an English poet, born in 1777. His reputation rests mainly on his "Pleasures of Hope," and "Gertrude of Wyoming." As a writer of national songs he has never been surpassed. Died, 1844.

Campbell-Bannerman, Rt. Hon. Sir Henry, ex-prime minister of Great Britain, was born in 1836. Educated at Glasgow University and Trinity College, Cambridge (B. A. honors, 1858; M. A., 1861); financial secretary in war office, 1871-74 and 1880-82; secretary admiralty, 1882-84; chief secretary of Ireland, 1884-85; secretary for war, 1886 and 1892-95; chosen leader of the Liberal Opposition in succession to Sir William Harcourt, February, 1899. Notwithstanding the differences between Liberal Imperialists and other Liberals over the Boer War, a unanimous vote of confidence in his leadership was carried at a meeting of the Liberal party held at the Reform Club, July, 1901. Again received the solid support of the Liberal party in the House in 1903, 1904, and 1905. On the resignation of the Balfour administration in December, 1905, he was summoned by the king and formed a Liberal Cabinet himself becoming first lord of the treasury and prime minister; the general election which followed gave him a tremendous majority. Died in office, 1908.

Canning, George (kăn'nîng), an English statesman and orator, born in London, 1770. He commenced his career at the bar, but being brought into the House of Commons by Mr. Pitt, he abandoned the law for politics. In Mr. Percival's administration, Canning became secretary of state for Foreign Affairs, and largely contributed in that capacity to the overthrow of the plans of Napoleon. In 1816, he was appointed president of the Board of Control of Indian Affairs, and, in 1822, foreign secretary for the second time. On the death of Earl of Liverpool, Canning became first minister of the Crown, and distinguished his government by the liberal tendencies of his home and foreign policy. Died, 1827.

Carson, Christopher, popularly known as Kit Carson, an American frontiersman, born in Kentucky in 1809. He was successively a saddler's apprentice, trapper, hunter, guide in Fremont's explorations, lieutenant in the rifle corps of the army (1847), and Indian agent. During the Civil War he rendered important services in the territories, and was brevetted brigadier general. Died in Colorado, 1868.

Carteret, Philip, an English navigator, who made an expedition to the South Seas in 1766-69, and discovered Queen Charlotte's Isles, and other islands, two of which he called Gower and Carteret.

Cartier, Sir George Etienne (kär-tyā'), a Canadian statesman, born in 1814. He was deeply involved in the rebellion of 1837. In 1848, he was elected to the house of assembly, in 1856 was appointed provincial secretary, and soon became attorney-general. In 1857, he became leader of the Lower Canada section of the government, and in 1858, premier; and he held a cabinet office for several years afterward. He was prominent in numerous governmental reforms. Died, 1873.

Cartier, Jacques (kär-tyā'), a French explorer, was born 1494. Employed by Francis I. to make explorations on the North American coast, in three successive expeditions, 1534-50; he completed the discovery and colonization of Canada.

Cartwright, Edmund, inventor of the power loom and the carding machine; born in Nottinghamshire; was bred for the Church. His invention, at first violently opposed, to his ruin for the time being, is now universally adopted; a grant of £10,000 was made him by parliament in consideration of his services and in compensation for his losses. He had a turn for versifying as well as mechanical invention. Cartwright was born in 1743, and died in 1823.

Caruso, Signor, who is generally acknowledged to be the finest tenor of the present day, began life as an engineer, with no thought of singing until a friend assured him that there was a fortune in his voice. So he studied for a while, and made a first appearance in opera, some few years ago, in his native city, Naples. His success was immediate, and he now sings at all the greatest opera houses in the world, commanding fees of thousands of dollars per night. Caruso, who is immensely popular in society, is a most genial man. His greatest hobby is drawing, and he might have made a good deal of money as a caricaturist, judging by the remarkably clever pictures of himself and his friends which he is always executing.

Casabianca, Louis, a French naval officer, born in Bastia about 1755, and in 1798, was captain of the flagship "L'Orient" in the expedition to Egypt. He was mortally wounded at the battle of the Nile, August 1, 1798; the ship caught fire, his 10-year-old son would not leave him, and both were floating on the wreck of the ship's mast when the final explosion took place.

Cass, Lewis, born in 1782; American statesman and general, appointed governor of Michigan in 1813. He showed great prudence in his management of Indian affairs and in 1831, became secretary of war in the administration of President Jackson. Whilst representative of the United States in France, he protested vigorously and effectually against the terms of the quintuple treaty, and returning to America was elected to the senate in 1845. In 1857, he became secretary of state, but about five years later withdrew from public life. Died, 1866.

Castelar, Emilio, born in 1832; Spanish statesman and writer; condemned to death owing to his attacks on the government in 1868. He fled to France, but shortly returned, and espoused the cause of the Federal Republic; was appointed dictator on the resignation of Amadeus (1873), but resigned a few months later. He was an eloquent speaker, and wrote many works. Died, 1899.

Castlereagh (käs'-sl-ra), Robert Stewart, Lord, eldest son of the Marquis of Londonderry; was born in 1769. At an early period he entered into public life, and was appointed keeper of the signet, or privy seal, in Ireland, in 1797; president of the board of control in 1802; and secretary of war in 1805. A difference having arisen between him and his colleague, Mr. Canning, a duel was the consequence, and both quitted office. During Lord Liverpool's administration, Lord Castlereagh again became a member of the government as foreign secretary, and concluded the treaty of Paris in 1814. He remained in office the remainder of his life, which was closed by suicide in 1822.

Catherine of Aragon, Queen of England; born in 1483; daughter of Ferdinand of Aragon and Isabella of Castile; married first Arthur, Prince of Wales, and subsequently his brother, afterwards Henry VIII. She was beautiful and virtuous, yet the king in 1527 sought a divorce on the ground that the marriage was uncanonical. After much temporizing on the part of the pope, the marriage was in 1533, pronounced invalid by Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, and his sentence was ratified by act of parliament. Catherine spent the rest of her life in Kimbolton castle. Died, 1536.

Catherine de Medicis, born in 1519; great granddaughter of Lorenzo the Magnificent, niece of Pope Clement VII., and queen to Henri II. of France, acted as regent during the minority of her second son, Charles IX.; her policy was to play off the parties of the Guises and the Condés against one another. She instigated the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Died, 1589.

Catherine Parr, born in 1512; daughter of Sir T. Parr; was married first to Edward Borough, secondly to Lord Latimer, and in 1543 became the sixth and last wife of Henry VIII. She was learned in theology and a zealous Protestant, and, according to Foxe, on one occasion only escaped death as a heretic by timely submission to the king. She survived Henry, and in 1547 married Lord Seymour of Sudeley, who was accused of hastening her death (in child-birth), by poisoning. Died, 1548.

Catherine I., Empress of Russia; born about 1685; was the outcast infant of a Livonian peasant-girl, and became nurse in the family of the Protestant minister of Marienburg. In 1701 she married a Swedish dragoon, who soon afterwards went with his regiment to Riga, and never returned. After the capture of Marienburg by the Russians, Catherine became the mistress first of General Bauer, with whom she lived at Moscow, secondly of Prince Menshikoff, and finally, of Peter the Great, who married her privately near Warsaw in 1711, and publicly the next year at St. Petersburg. She then embraced the Greek religion, and took the name of Catherine. On the death of Peter, in 1725, she was proclaimed Czarina. Her death was the result of intemperance. Died, 1727.

Catherine II., Empress of Russia; born in 1729; the Princess Sophia Augusta, daughter of the Prince of Anhalt-Zerbst, on her marriage in 1745, with Peter, nephew and heir of the Empress Elizabeth, assumed the name of Catherine Alexiovnna. Her refinement and love of study contrasted with her husband's vulgarity and intemperance; neglected by him, she ingratiated herself with some of the nobles; her intrigues were discovered by Peter, and, on ascending the throne in 1762, he threatened to repudiate her, whereupon she imprisoned him and had him strangled. The subsequent murder of Ivan, the next heir, left Catherine in undisputed possession of the throne. As empress she seized the Crimea, and took part in the dismemberment of Poland. She promoted the welfare of Russia by encouraging literature and commerce, but her reign was sullied by disgraceful amours. Died, 1796.

Catiline (kat'-e-line). Lucius Sergius, an ancient Roman, was descended from a patrician family, renowned for talent but degraded by crime. He gained the favor of Scylla, who advanced him to offices of great importance. He was a reckless sensualist. Having won for his paramour a member of a distinguished family, he married the daughter he had by her. He was charged with intriguing with a vestal, the sister of Cicero's wife. After Scylla's death, Catiline formed a conspiracy to murder the consuls and senators, and to assume the government. His designs were discovered and exposed in an oration by Cicero, which gave the speaker lasting fame. He attempted to execute his plan, but a great battle ensuing, and victory inclining to the other side, he threw himself into the midst of the enemy and was slain. 63 B. C.

Cavour, Camillo, Count di (kah-voor'), an eminent Italian statesman; born in 1810. In 1847, he took an active part in the promulgation of the liberal doctrines then agitating his country, and largely assisted in the establishment of the constitution granted by King Charles Albert in 1848. In 1850, he became minister of commerce, and minister of finances the following year. In 1852, he succeeded D'Azeglio as first minister, secured the liberty of the press, favored religious toleration and free trade, and during his seven years' tenure of office brought about the regeneration of Italy by the treaty of Villa Franca in 1857. Died, 1861.

Caxton, William (käks'tun), the founder of English printing, was born in 1412. During a residence in Flanders, he acquired the new typographic art, and on his return set up a press in the Almonry, Westminster, where he brought out the first printed book seen in England, the "History of Troy." Died, 1491.

Cenci, Beatrice (chén'che), a noble Roman lady, whose tragic fate has served as the theme of one of Shelley's best tragedies, lived in the Sixteenth Century. She became the victim of her father, Count Francesco Cenci, a notorious libertine. Failing in her appeal for protection from Pope Clement VIII., she, it has been said, conspired with other members of her family to murder the count. When brought to trial on this charge, she asserted her innocence, but was, nevertheless, put to death, along with her relatives, in 1599. The fine portrait of Beatrice, by Guido Reni, in the Barberini gallery, Rome, is well known.

Cervantes de Saavedra, Miguel, de, Spanish author; born at Alcalá de Henares in 1547, belonged to an ancient Galician family, and was educated at the University of Salamanca, where he spent his time chiefly in writing verses. After following Cardinal Aquaviva as chamberlain into Italy, he enlisted under Marc Antonio Colonna, and distinguished himself at the battle of Lepanto (1571), where he lost his left hand; in 1575, was captured by a corsair, and spent five years in slavery at Algiers. In 1588, he settled at Seville, and for the next ten years devoted his time mainly to writing dramas. In 1605, the first part of "Don Quixote" appeared, and the second followed ten years later. Among the other works of Cervantes are "Novelas Exemplares," "Viage al Parnaso," and "Galatea." Died, 1616.

Chaffee, Adna Romanza, lieutenant-general, United States Army; born in Orwell, O., April 14, 1842; educated in public schools. Entered army, July 22, 1861; first lieutenant, July 3, 1863, for gallantry at Gettysburg; captain, March 31, 1865, for gallantry at Dinwiddie Court House, Va.; major, March 7, 1868, for gallantry in engagement with Comanche Indians on Paint Tree Creek, Tex.; lieutenant-colonel, February 27, 1890, for gallantry in action against Indians in Texas and Arizona. Appointed brigadier-general, United States Volunteers, May 4, 1898; commanded third brigade, second division, fifth corps, Santiago campaign June to August, 1898; commanded second division, fifth corps, August to September, 1898; promoted major-general, United States Volunteers, July 8, 1898; commanded first division, fourth corps, November to December, 1898; chief of staff division of Cuba, December, 1898, to May, 1900. Honorably discharged as major-general, April 13, 1899. Appointed brigadier-general of United States Volunteers, April 13, 1900. Assigned to the command of United States forces for the relief of United States Legation, Peking, June 24, 1900; arrived at Peking, China, August 14, 1900; promoted to major-general of United States Volunteers, June 20, 1900; promoted to major-general of United States Army, February 5, 1901. Assigned to command division of the Philippines and appointed military governor, to take effect July 4, 1901; relieved September 30, 1902, and assigned to command department of the East; detailed to general staff corps, October 2, 1903, and assigned to duty as assistant to chief of staff, Washington; promoted to lieutenant-general of United States Army, January 9, 1904, and chief of staff until his retirement in 1906.

Chalmers, Thomas, born in 1780; Scottish divine, educated at St. Andrews, where he taught mathematics after his ordination. In 1815, he became a minister at Glasgow, and at once attracted attention by his eloquence. He was subsequently professor of moral philosophy at St. Andrews (1823) and of theology at Edinburgh (1828). On the disruption of the Church of Scotland (1843) he joined the Free Church party, and became moderator of its assembly and principal of its college. His writings embrace a wide range of subjects, including natural science and political economy. Died, 1847.

Chamberlain, Rt. Hon. Joseph, British statesman, was born in London, July, 1836; educated in private school and University College, London; joined the firm of Nettlefold, screw makers of Birmingham; was one of the leaders of the defeated unsectarian candidates for the school board of Birmingham in 1870, but in 1873 he was elected chairman, and was also a member of the town council (mayor, 1873). On the death of his father he retired from the firm, in order to devote all his energies to public life. To him was due the transfer of the gas and water works to the borough authorities, and he was the author of the improvement scheme which has entirely transformed the face of central Birmingham. In 1876, he entered parliament and took his seat below the gangway with the Radicals; president of Board of Trade, with cabinet rank, 1880-85, and passed a patents bill and a bankruptcy bill; president of Local Government Board in 1885, until his divergence of views on the Irish policy of Mr. Gladstone caused his resignation (March 27, 1886); chief commissioner to the Conference at Washington for the settlement of the dispute between the United States and Canada on the Fisheries Question. Married Miss Endicott, November 15, 1888. In 1895, took office under Lord Salisbury as colonial secretary. The negotiations with the Transvaal, which ended in war, occupied him fully during 1899, and his South African policy was one of the main controversial features of the general election of 1900 and during 1901. He had charge in 1900 of the measure for the constitution of the Australian Commonwealth. On February 14, 1902, he was presented with an address by the City of London Corporation. He presided over the 1902 Colonial Conference. In November, 1902, he visited South Africa, and on his return received an address from the Lord Mayor and Corporation of London (March 20, 1903). In May, 1903, he launched, at Birmingham, his scheme for the revision of the fiscal policy of the country and the adoption of a policy of preferential tariffs; and in September, believing that policy to be at that time unacceptable to the majority in the constituencies, he resigned, in order to be free to devote himself to explaining and popularizing his proposals. He began his campaign for this purpose at Glasgow on October 6, 1903, and the tariff commission was afterwards set up on his initiative. He is president of the Central Liberal Unionist Council and of the Imperial tariff committee. His 70th birthday and completion of thirty years' service as member of parliament for Birmingham were celebrated on July 7, 1906.

Chambers, Robert William, author, artist; born in Brooklyn, May 26, 1865; educated at Julian's Academy, Paris, 1886-93. First exhibited in salon, 1889; illustrations for "Life," "Truth," "Vogue," etc. Author: "In the Quarter," "The King in Yellow," "The Red Republic," "A King and a Few Dukes," "The Maker of Moons," "With the Band," "The Mystery of Choice," "Lorraine," "Ashes of Empire," "The Haunts of Men," "The Cambic Mask," "Outsiders," "The Conspirators," "Cardigan," "The Maid-at-Arms," "Outdoor Land," "The Maids of Paradise," "Orchard-Land," "Forest-Land," "Iole." Also "The Witch of Ellangowan," a drama played at Daly's Theater and written for Miss Ada Rehan; and many magazine stories.

Chamisso, Adalbert von, born at the Castle of Boncourt, in Champagne, France, A. D. 1781; a celebrated lyric poet of Germany, who, though born in France, was driven from that country by the Revolution of 1790, and spent the greater part of his life in Prussia. He is best known by his "Peter Schlemihl, the Story of a Man Who Lost His Shadow," which was published in 1814, and has been translated into most European languages. Died in Berlin, 1838.

Champlain, Samuel de, a French naval officer of the Seventeenth Century. During the reign of Henry IV., of France, he visited many parts of America, and formed the first French establishments at Quebec and Montreal. He was made governor of Quebec, from which he was driven by the English, in 1631. When peace was restored, he was reinstated. He wrote an account of his "Voyages and Travels in New France, called Canada," in 1632; and died in 1635.

Chandler, William Eaton, lawyer; born in Concord, N. H., December 28, 1835; common school education; graduate of Harvard Law School, and admitted to the bar, 1855; became reporter of decisions of Supreme Court, New Hampshire, 1859; member of New Hampshire Legislature, 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1881; speaker, 1863-64; appointed solicitor and judge-advocate-general, navy department, March 9, 1865; first assistant secretary of treasury, June 17, 1865; resigned, November 30, 1867; member of New Hampshire Constitutional Convention, 1876 and 1902; appointed solicitor-general of United States, March 23, 1881, but rejected by senate; secretary of the navy, April 12, 1882, to March 7, 1885; United States senator, 1887-1901; president of Spanish Treaty Claims commission since March 9, 1901.

Channing, Edward, historian; born in Dorchester, Mass., June 15, 1856; graduate of Harvard, 1878; instructor, 1883; now professor of history at Harvard. Author: "The United States, 1765-1865," "A Student's History of the United States," "Town and County Government in the English Colonies of North America," "Narragansett Planters," "The Planting of a Nation in the New World," etc. Collaborator with late Justin Winsor on "The Narrative and Critical History of America"; with Albert B. Hart in "Guide to Study of American History"; and with Thomas W. Higginson in "English History for Americans."

Channing, William Ellery, an eminent American divine, and one of the most elegant writers this country has produced, was born in Newport, R. I., 1780. In 1803, he became pastor of the Federal Street Church, Boston. During the Unitarian controversy, Dr. Channing was the head of the Liberal party, and took an active part in its defense. Among his most successful productions are his lectures on "Self-Culture," and on the "Elevation of the Laboring Classes." His work on slavery, published in 1841, had also a wide circulation. Died, 1842.

Charlemagne, i. e., Charles or Karl the Great, the first Carolingian King of the Franks, son and successor of Pepin le Bref (the Short); became sole ruler on the death of his brother, Carloman, in 771; he subjugated by his arms the southern Gauls, the Lombards, the Saxons, and the Avars, and conducted a successful expedition against the Moors in Spain, with the result that his kingdom extended from the Ebro to the Elbe; having passed over into Italy in support of the pope, he was, on Christmas day, 800, crowned Emperor of the West, after which he devoted himself to the welfare of his subjects, and proved himself as great in legislation as in arms; enacted laws for the empire, called capitularies; reformed the judicial administration, patronized letters, and established schools; kept himself in touch and au courant with everything over his vast domain. He died and was buried at Aix-la-Chapelle (742-814).

Charles I., King of England, third son of James I., was born in Dunfermline in 1600. Failing in his suit for the infanta of Spain, he married Henrietta Maria, a French princess, a devoted Catholic, who had great influence over him, but not for good. He had for public advisors, Strafford and Laud, who cherished in him ideas of absolute power adverse to the liberty of the subject. Acting on these ideas brought him into collision with the parliament, and provoked a civil war; himself being the first to throw down the gauntlet by raising the royal standard at Nottingham, in the end of which he surrendered himself to the Scots' army at Newark, who delivered him to the parliament. He was tried as a traitor to his country, condemned to death, and beheaded at Whitehall, January 30, 1649.

Charles II., King of England, son of Charles I., born in St. James Palace, London, in 1630; was at The Hague, in Holland, when his father was beheaded. He assumed the royal title, and was proclaimed king by the Scots; landed in Scotland, and was crowned at Scone. Marching into England, he was defeated by Cromwell at Worcester, September 3, 1651, and fled to France. By the policy of General Monk, after Cromwell's death, he was restored to his crown and kingdom in 1660, an event known as the Restoration. Charles II. was an easy-going man, and is known in history as the "Merry Monarch." His reign was an inglorious one for England, though it is distinguished by the passing of the Habeas Corpus Act, one of the great bulwarks of English liberty next to the Magna Charta. Died, 1685.

Charles V. (I. of Spain), Emperor of Germany, son of Philip, Archduke of Austria, was born in Ghent in 1500, and became King of Spain in 1516, on the death of his maternal grandfather, Ferdinand, and Emperor of Germany in 1519, on the death of his paternal grandfather, Maximilian I., being crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1520, and reigned during one of the most important periods in the history of Europe. The events of the reign are too numerous to detail; enough to mention his rivalry with Francis I. of France, his contention as a Catholic with the Protestants of Germany, the inroads of the Turks, revolts in Spain, and expeditions against the pirates of the Mediterranean. The ambition of his life was the suppression of the Protestant Reformation and the succession of his son Philip to the imperial crown, but he failed in both, and finally resigned in favor of his son, and retired into the monastery at St. Yuste, in Estremadura, near which he built a magnificent retreat, where, it is understood, notwithstanding his apparent retirement, he continued to take interest in political affairs, and to advise in the management of them. Died, 1558.

Charles XII., King of Sweden, son of Charles XI., a warlike prince, ascended the throne at the age of 15. He had to cope with Denmark, Russia, and Poland combined against him; he foiled the Danes at Copenhagen, the Russians at Narva, and Augustus II. of Poland at Riga; but being trapped in Russia, and cooped up to spend a winter there, he was, in the spring of 1709, attacked by Peter the Great at Pultowa, and defeated, so that he had to take refuge with the Turks at Bender; here he was again attacked, captured, and conveyed to Demotica, but escaping, he found his way miraculously back to Sweden, and making peace with the czar, commenced an attack on Norway, but was killed by a musket-shot at the siege of Friederickshall. Charles XII. was "the last of the Swedish kings." "His appearance among the luxurious kings and knights of the North" at the time, Carlyle compares to "the bursting of a cataract of bomb-shells in a dull ballroom." Born in 1682, and died in 1718.

Charles Martel, the illegitimate son of Pépin d'Héristal, Duke of Austrasia, was born about 690, died, 741; he became mayor of the palace during the reigns of Chilperic and Thierry IV., exercised the whole regal power, defeating the Saracens at Poitiers, in 732, in honor of which victory he was called Martel (the Hammer). On the death of Thierry in 736, Charles carried on the government as Duke of the Franks. His son, Pépin, was founder of the Carolingian line of monarchs, taking their name from Charles Martel.

Chase, Salmon Portland, an American jurist and statesman, was born in New Hampshire in 1808. He was sent to the House of Representatives and to the United States Senate from Ohio, and was elected governor of that State. Appointed secretary of the treasury by President Lincoln, at the outbreak of the Civil War, he conducted the finances with rare skill and success. Appointed chief justice of the Supreme Court in 1864, he held this office at his death in 1873.

Chatham, William Pitt, Earl of, born in 1708. English statesman, son of Robert Pitt; became member of parliament in 1735, attaching himself to the so-called patriotic party under the Prince of Wales; he attacked Walpole and Carteret successively, and after the retirement of the latter in 1744, supported the ministries of Pelham and Newcastle, and was made paymaster of the forces, a post which he lost owing to his anti-Hanoverian speeches. As secretary of state in 1756, and again in 1757, under Newcastle, he carried on the war against France with great vigor and success, but on the accession of George III. had to give place to his favorite, the Earl of Bute. Pitt's health was now shattered, but he was carried down to the house to speak against the peace of Paris in 1762, and afterwards supported the repeal of the Stamp Act, an act which led to the revolt of the American colonies. In 1766 he was created Earl of Chatham, and from his place in the House of Lords continued to urge a policy of conciliation towards America. It was while thus engaged that he sank down in the fit of apoplexy from which he never recovered. Died, 1778.

Chaucer (tshaw'-ser), Geoffrey, an English poet, commonly spoken of as the father of English poetry; born about 1328, of parents who appear to have been citizens of London, and gave him a learned education. In his youth he served under Edward III. in the invasion of France, and was made prisoner by the enemy at the end of 1359, or early in 1360. He afterwards enjoyed court favor, and was employed on several embassies, visiting France and Italy in the course of his foreign missions. In the latter part of the reign of Richard II. he appears to have been involved in the disgrace thrown on the family of the Duke of Lancaster, his patron, and suffered from poverty; but on the accession of Henry IV., he was again taken into royal favor. The writings of Chaucer, in verse and prose, are extensive; and the "Canterbury Tales" is one of the noblest monuments of English poetry. Died October 25, 1400.

Cheops, or Cheopses (tshe'-ops, tshe-os'-peez), a king of Egypt, who reigned about the year B. C. 1178. He built the great pyramid, and spent 1,060 talents in vegetables alone for the workmen engaged on it. He changed that government into a despotic tyranny which had previously been a limited monarchy, and died, after reigning fifty-six years, hated by his people, 1122 B. C.

Cherubini, Maria Luigi Carlo Zenobi Salvatore (ka-roo-bé'ne), an eminent Italian composer, was born at Florence in 1760. He was naturalized in France, and settled in Paris, the scene of his greatest triumphs, where he composed operas, of which the chief were "Iphigenia in Aulis," and "Les deux Journées; or The Water-Carrier," his masterpiece; also a number of sacred pieces and requiems, all of the highest merit. Died, 1842.

Chesterfield (tshes'-ter-feeld), Philip Dormer Stanhope, Earl of, was born in 1694, and educated at Cambridge. He represented Lostwithiel in the House of Commons, and in 1726 succeeded to the earldom. He was distinguished at the court of George II., and was sent ambassador extraordinary to Holland in 1728. He was made a knight of the garter in 1730, and received the appointment of lord steward of the household. He was found among the opponents of Sir Robert Walpole. In 1745, he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and afterwards became secretary of state. He is now more known by his "Advice to His Son," than by his public services. Died, 1773.

Choate, Joseph Hodges, lawyer, diplomat, ambassador of United States to England, 1899-1905; born in Salem, Mass., January 24, 1832; graduate of Harvard and Harvard Law School, 1852. Admitted to Massachusetts bar, 1855; New York, 1856; settled in New York, 1856. Identified with many famous cases; one of the committee of seventy which broke up the Tweed ring, 1871; secured the reinstatement of General Fitz John Porter to his army rank, etc.; governor of New York Hospital since 1877 (chairman of committee of elections); noted as a public and after-dinner speaker. Author: "Addresses on Abraham Lincoln, Admiral Farragut, Rufus Choate," etc. Elected bencher of the Inner Temple, England, April 10, 1905.

Choate, Rufus (chōt), an eminent American advocate, was born in 1799. After graduating at Dartmouth College, he entered upon the study of law at Cambridge and in Washington. After practicing at Danvers, Salem, and Boston, successively, he was elected to the Senate in 1841, which he quitted in 1845. After the death of Daniel Webster, Choate became the recognized leader of the Massachusetts bar, and acquired quite a national reputation. As an advocate and orator, he may be classed with the most distinguished masters of modern eloquence. Died, 1859.

Choiseul (shwoi'-zēul), Stephen Francis, Duke of, was born in 1719. He gained a high rank in the army, and was then employed as a diplomatist at Rome and Vienna, and honored with a peerage. He became prime minister of France, it was reported, through the influence of Madame de Pompadour. In 1770, he was dismissed from office, and exiled to one of his estates. He died in 1785.

Christina, Queen of Sweden, born in 1626; succeeded her father, Gustavus Adolphus, in 1632. After her coronation in 1650, she fell under the influence of favorites, and ceased to interest herself in state affairs. She resigned the crown to her cousin, Charles Gustavus, in 1654, was baptized by the pope, and lived for some time at Paris. On the death of Charles Gustavus, in 1660, she vainly endeavored to regain the throne. She died at Rome in 1689.

Christy, Howard Chandler, illustrator, writer; born in Morgan County, Ohio, January 10, 1873; educated at Duncan's Falls, O.; went East in 1893; since then on New York illustrated periodicals; went to Cuba with second United States regulars and "Rough Riders"; saw the fighting before Santiago; his letters and illustrations published in Scribner's Magazine, Harper's Magazine, Collier's Weekly, and by R. H. Russell, publisher. Has charge of illustrating class at Cooper Institute.

Chrysostom, St. John, one of the Greek fathers, born about 347; gave himself, from an early age, to a life of prayer and asceticism, and, in 397, was made Bishop of Constantinople by the Emperor Arcadius. He was renowned for his eloquence and almsgiving, and his zeal as a reformer made him many enemies, amongst them the Empress Eudoxia. He was summoned before a synod at Chalcedon, deposed, and banished, but an insurrection of the people led to his immediate recall. He was soon afterwards deposed again, and conveyed to the Taurus Mountains, whence he was ordered to proceed to Pityus, on the Euxine, but died on the journey at Comana in 407.

Cicero, Marcus Tullius; born in Arpinum in 106 B. C.; Roman orator and statesman, studied rhetoric under Milo and others; commenced pleading at the age of twenty-six, and offending Sulla by his successful defense of Roscius Amerinus, retired to Athens, where he studied under Antiochus; went as quaestor to Sicily in 76, and on his return impeached Verres, a former governor; was aedile in 69, praetor in 66, and, in 64, was elected consul in opposition to Catiline. His vigor in putting down the conspiracy of the latter gained for him the title of "father of his country." The measures passed by his enemy, the tribune Clodius, obliged him to withdraw to Greece. After about sixteen months, he was recalled by the senate, and, in 52, went as governor to Cilicia. He sided with the senate and afterwards with Pompey against Cæsar, but submitted to the latter after Pharsalia, and retiring to his Tusculan villa, wrote his "De Natura Deorum," and other philosophical works. His defense of Cæsar's murderers and the "philippic" orations directed against Marcus Antonius led to his proscription on the formation of the second triumvirate. He was murdered by Antonius's emissaries in 43 B. C.

Cid Campeador, Ruy, or Rodrigo Dias de Bivar, hero of Spanish fiction, aided Sancho of Castile against his brother, Alfonso, King of Aragon, but on the death of Sancho, acknowledged Alfonso as King of Castile. He lost the favor of Alfonso, and retired from his court.

but obtained some aid from him in capturing the city of Valencia from the Moors (1094), which he ruled till his death.

Cimabue, Giovanni, born in 1240; Italian artist, founder of the Florentine school, shook himself free from the traditions of Byzantine art, and by following nature and the impulses of his own genius prepared the way for the future greatness of Italy in the fine arts. The exhibition of his table of "The Virgin" for the Rucellai chapel in Santa Maria Novella was the occasion of a public festival. Except the "Madonna," little of his work remains. Died, 1302.

Cincinnatus, Lucius Quintus (sîn-sîn-nah'tus), a famous Roman general, who, being made dictator, in 458 B. C., to carry on the war against the Æqui and Volsci, was found engaged in ploughing his own farm. He gained a decisive victory, and as soon as the war was over, laid down the office, returning to his simple and hardy life. In the year 439 B. C., he was again appointed dictator, on occasion of intestine troubles in Rome.

Clinton, George, an American commander and statesman, born in 1739. He served in early life under General Amherst against the French, and afterwards studied the law. During the struggle for independence in the North American Colonies, he sat in Congress, and was made a brigadier-general. With an inferior force, he succeeded in preventing Sir Henry Clinton from assisting General Burgoyne. Died, 1812.

Clinton, Sir Henry, an English general, succeeded Sir William Howe as commander-in-chief in America, was born, 1738. His course was marked by bravery and good conduct, but not with success. After his return to England he was appointed governor of Limerick, and subsequently of Gibraltar, where he died in 1795.

Clovis I., son of Childeric I., was born about 467, and is regarded as the real founder of the French Monarchy. He succeeded Childeric in 481. The victory of Soissons, which he gained in 486, over Syagrius, rendered him master of all the Roman possessions in the center of Gaul. Victorious when opposed to the Germans at Tolbiac near Cologne, in 496, he is said to have made a vow of embracing Christianity, and to have kept his promise. He was baptized by St. Remigius, Archbishop of Rheims. Having conquered Alaric, King of the Visigoths, in 507, he gained most of the south provinces, but was himself overthrown near Arles, by Theodoric, in 509. Died, 511.

Cobden, Richard, an eminent British politician and reformer, was born at Dunford, in Sussex, in June, 1804. His early life was spent in connection with manufacturing industry at Manchester; and it was not till the year 1837, when he unsuccessfully contested the borough of Stockport, that he became publicly known. In 1840, the anti-corn-law agitation commenced; and in the cause of free trade Mr. Cobden took the foremost rank, until the accomplishment of its principles, in 1846. Shortly afterwards a public subscription was raised, and the handsome sum of £70,000 was contributed, as a testimonial of his countrymen to the unwearied exertions of Mr. Cobden. He represented the West Riding of Yorkshire until 1857; and, in 1860, succeeded, with M. Chevalier, in completing a free-trade treaty between France and Great Britain. He died on the 2d of April, 1865.

Coke, Sir Edward, born in 1552; judge and law writer, educated at Norwich grammar school and Cambridge, was called to the bar in 1578; early acquired a high reputation, and became solicitor-general in 1592, and attorney-general in 1594. He showed much harshness in his prosecution of Essex, Raleigh, and others; but his loyalty gained him the chief justiceship of the common pleas, in 1606. In this position and that of chief justice of the king's bench (1613), he opposed James I.'s claim to exercise prerogatives and was temporarily deprived in 1616. Entering parliament in 1621, he there resisted the king's encroachments; was imprisoned in the Tower in 1622, and in 1628, took the chief part in drawing up the Petition of Right. The remainder of his life was spent in compiling his "Commentaries upon Littleton." Died, 1634.

Colbert, Jean Baptiste, born in Rheims, A. D. 1619; a distinguished French statesman, minister of finance in the reign of Louis XIV. His whole life was devoted to financial and fiscal reforms, and to the encouragement of commerce and manufactures. To him the kingdom was indebted for the enlargement of its navy, for the acquisition of many of its foreign possessions, and for a large number of internal improvements. He instituted the Royal Academy of Painting and Sculpture, and also the Academies of Science and of Architecture. The Gardens of the Tuileries, the Hôtel des Invalides, the façade of the Louvre, and several of the quays along the Seine, were all the work of Colbert. Died, 1683.

Coleridge, Samuel Taylor, a poet, essayist, and dramatist, was born at Bristol in 1772. He was sent to Christ's hospital, and subsequently studied at Cambridge, where, in 1792, he obtained the prize for the best Greek ode. His works are many, and are generally distinguished by benevolence and piety. His "Sibylline Leaves" and "Biographia Literaria" found many admirers, and several of his poems were deemed beautiful. Died, 1834.

Coligny, Gaspard de Chatillon, Sire de (ko-lain-ye'), a noted French Huguenot, was born in 1517, and murdered in the St. Bartholomew Massacre, 1572. In early life he attained great distinction as a military leader, and was created admiral in 1552. After the accession of Charles IX., he became a Protestant, and on the breaking out of the civil war, he became, with the Prince de Condé, the leader of the Huguenots.

Colt, Samuel, an American inventor, born at Hartford, Conn., in 1814. He early conceived the idea of revolving fire-arms, and, in 1835, took out a patent for the weapon since known the world over as "Colt's revolver." In 1848, he established a company for the working out of his patent, and built at Hartford one of the most extensive armories in the world. Died, 1862.

Columbus, Christopher, discoverer of America, on October 12, 1492, after two months of great peril and, in the end, mutiny of his men; was born in Genoa, 1438. He went to sea at 14, and cherished, if he did not conceive, the idea of reaching India by sailing westward. He applied in many quarters for furtherance, and, after seven years of waiting, was provided with three small vessels and a crew of 120 men. First touching land at the Bahamas, he visited Cuba and Hayti, and returned home with spoils of the land, and was hailed and honored as "King of the Sea." He made three subsequent visits, and on the third had the satisfaction of landing on the mainland, which Sebastian Cabot and Amerigo Vespucci had reached before him; but he became at last the victim of jealousy, and charges were made against him, which so cut him to the heart that he never rallied from the attack, and he died at Valladolid, in 1506, broken in body and in soul. Carlyle, in a famous passage, salutes him across the centuries: "Brave sea-captain, Norse sea-king, Columbus, my hero, royalist sea-king of all."

Comstock, Anthony, secretary and special agent of New York Society for Suppression of Vice since March 2, 1872; born in New Canaan, Conn., March 7, 1844; educated in district school and Wyckoff's Academy, New Canaan, and 1860-61, high school, New Britain, Conn.; left school to earn living, 1861. His brother, Samuel, having been killed at Gettysburg, volunteered to fill his place in regiment, enlisting in 17th Connecticut Volunteer Infantry, December, 1863; mustered out, July, 1865. Appointed, March 3, 1873, and since then, post-office inspector of New York; was prominent in Y. M. C. A. As secretary and special agent of New York Society for Suppression of Vice and post-office inspector, has brought about 2,800 criminals to justice and destroyed ninety tons of obscene literature and pictures, etc. Author: "Frauds Exposed," "Gambling Outrages," "Morals vs. Art," "Traps for the Young."

Conde, Louis de Bourbon, Prince of, born in 1530; joined the Huguenots after the death of Henri II., and, together with Coligny, became their leader during the reign of Charles IX. He was wounded at Dreux (1562), lost the battle of St. Denys (1567), and was killed at Jarnac (1569).

Condorcet (kong-dor'-sa), Jean Marie Antoine Nicholas Caritat, marquis de, was born in 1743. He gained celebrity by his successful labors as a mathematician. His treatise on integral calculations, written when he was but twenty-two years of age, was eminently successful, and was considered to indicate a degree of knowledge seldom possessed at so early an age. He was the friend of D'Alembert and of almost all his illustrious contemporaries, as well as one of the disciples of Voltaire. Being appointed governor of the dauphin by the constituent assembly, he was successively called to the legislative body and to the convention; but subsequently denounced as a partizan of the Girondists, he was outlawed in 1793, and shortly after was taken prisoner, when he poisoned himself, in 1794.

Confucius (kon-fu'-se-us), the Latinized name of K'ung-Fou-Tseu, a celebrated Chinese philosopher, supposed to have been born in the year 551 B. C. From his youth he devoted his hours to the study of philosophy. A mandarin when but 17 years of age, he resigned his office on the death of his mother, according to custom, and withdrew to solitude, giving himself up to profound meditation. He afterwards established a school, and had many disciples. The King of Lou invited him to his court and appointed him his first minister. He endeavored to correct the manners of his countrymen by his sage maxims. He effected important reforms, but the intrigues of his enemies prevailed against him, and he was sent into exile. He wrote several very important works, and died in 478 B. C.

Conrad III., founder of the Hohenstaufen Dynasty; elected Emperor of Germany in 1138; had Henry the Proud, as head of the German Guelfs, for rival; crushed him at Weinsberg; joined Louis VII. of France on a third crusade, and returning, overthrew the Guelfs again, leaving Barbarossa as his heir; born, 1093, died, 1152.

Constantine I. (kōn'stān-tīn), called The Great; born in 274, at Mœsia, was son of Constantius Chlorus by Helena. On the death of his father at York, where he accompanied him, was proclaimed emperor by the troops; this title being challenged by Maximian, his father-in-law, and Maxentius, his brother-in-law, he took up arms against first the one and then the other, and defeated them. When one day he saw a cross in the sky with the words, "By this Conquer," in Greek, under this sign, known as the labarum, which he adopted as his standard, he accordingly marched straight to Rome, where he was acknowledged emperor by the senate in 312, and thereafter an edict was issued named of Milan, granting toleration to the Christians. He had still to extend his empire over the East, and having done so by the removal of Lucinius, he transferred the seat of his empire to Byzantium, which hence got the name of Constantinople, i. e., Constantine's city. Constantine had himself baptized in 337 as a Christian, after having three years before proclaimed Christianity the state religion. Died, 337.

Cook, Frederick Albert, physician, explorer; born Callicoon Depot, Sullivan Co., N. Y., 1865; educated in Callicoon, 1871-78, in Brooklyn, 1878-85; M. D., University of New York, 1890; Sc. Author: "Through the First Antarctic Night"; "To the Top of the Continent."

Cook, Captain James, born in Marton, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, October 28, 1728; a celebrated English navigator, best known through his "Voyages Round the World." He made three principal voyages, in the course of which he made many important discoveries, but was ultimately killed in a quarrel with the natives of Hawaii, though he had never acted so as to deserve anything but confidence from the natives with whom he came in contact. His kindly disposition, and his scrupulous justice and humanity, were, with his skill as a navigator, among his first recommendations. After his death, at Hawaii, one of the Sandwich Islands, February 14, 1779, many honors were paid to his memory, both in his own and in foreign countries.

Cooper, James Fenimore, an illustrious American novelist, was born in Burlington, N. Y., 1789. After six years' experience of naval life, Cooper retired from the sea in 1810, and took up his residence at Cooperstown, Otsego County. In 1821, appeared his first work, "Precaution." In quick succession followed "The Spy," a tale which at once secured for him a place in the first rank of novelists; his almost unequalled sea stories, "The Red Rover," "Pilot," and "Water-witch"; his famous "Leather Stocking Series" of Indian life and adventure, the "Pioneers," "Last of the Mohicans," "Pathfinder," "Deerslayer," "Prairie," etc. Cooper, after passing some years in Europe, died in 1851. His works have been translated into every European language, and have exhausted numberless editions.

Copernicus, Nicolas, born in 1473 at Thorn, Prussia; founder of the modern system of astronomy, studied at Cracow and Bologna, and became professor of mathematics at Rome. Obtaining a canonry in the chapter of Frauenberg, he there wrote his work in Latin "On the Revolution of the Celestial Orbs," which he deferred publishing until a little before his death, in 1543, aware of the opposition it would arouse.

Corday D'Armands, Marie Charlotte, born in 1768, at St. Saturnin, Normandy, of a noble Norman family; sympathized with the ideas of the French Revolution but was horrified at its excesses; visited Paris in July, 1793, with the purpose, it is said, of assassinating Marat, or Robespierre; obtaining an interview with the former while in his bath, she stabbed him with a knife; was immediately apprehended and executed four days afterwards.

Corelli, Marie, Miss, was born, 1864, the adopted child of the poet, Charles Mackay; educated in a French convent, and studied for a musical career. At an early age betrayed literary gifts, and the success of "A Romance of Two Worlds," decided her course. Since then she has written a number of novels which have had large circulations. Persuaded Mr. Edward Morris, of Chicago, to purchase Harvard House, Stratford-on-Avon (which she had restored), and to present it to Harvard University, to which it now belongs.

Corneille (kor-nayl'), Pierre, born in 1606, in Rouen; French dramatist; was educated for the law, but the success of his first comedy, "Mélite," induced him to devote himself to literature. It was followed by other comedies, but from 1636 he preferred tragedy, producing "Médée," "Le Cid" (which established his fame), "Horace," "Cinna," "Polyeucte," "La Mort de Pompée," etc. "Le Menteur" was another successful comedy. Died, 1684.

Cornelia, the daughter of Scipio Africanus, was the wife of Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, who was consul, 177 B. C. By him Cornelia had twelve children, and was left, still in the prime of life, a widow. To her children she gave all her care, though only three reached maturity, but these owed to their mother the high distinction which they gained in the commonwealth. A lady, after displaying her jewels, asked to see those of Cornelia, who, producing her sons, said, "These are mine." Her hand was sought by the King of Egypt, but she withheld her consent. She encouraged her sons to be too ambitious, which eventually cost them their lives.

Cornell, Ezra, 1807, an American philanthropist; born in Westchester Landing, N. Y. He accumulated a large fortune and is best known as the founder of Cornell University. He began life as a mechanic and miller at Ithaca, N. Y., and subsequently became a contractor for the erection of telegraph lines. He died in Ithaca, in 1874.

Cornwallis, Charles, Marquis, born A. D. 1738; a prominent English statesman and general, celebrated as the general under whom the British forces were finally defeated (A. D. 1782) in the American War of Independence. He was afterwards governor-general and commander-in-chief in India, where he greatly distinguished himself by his victories over Tippoo Sahib; and still later (1798), he was lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and (1802), plenipotentiary of Great Britain to negotiate the Peace of Amiens. Appointed, in 1805, governor-general of India a second time; he died (1805) at Ghazipur, in the province of Benares, while on his way to assume the command of the troops.

Cortes, or Cortez (kor'-tez), Fernando, a Spanish adventurer; born in Medellin in Estremadura, in 1485. He was first destined for the law; but a passion for arms carrying him to the military profession, he went early in the Sixteenth Century, with Velasquez, to Cuba, and subsequently obtained the command of the expedition sent against Mexico. With seven hundred men under his command, he landed at Tobasco in 1518, and immediately burned his ships, that his followers might have no hope but in victory. He advanced to Mexico, where he was at first received with friendly demonstrations; but on his seizing Montezuma, the Mexican king, whom he subsequently put to death by fire, a struggle ensued, in which many thousands of lives were lost. He eventually succeeded in putting down all opposition, and in overrunning Mexico. While effecting this he is believed to have perpetrated the most enormous cruelties. He was rewarded with the title of marquis, and a grant of land; but subsequently, on his return to Spain, he found himself very much neglected. He died near Seville, in 1547.

Dante Alighieri, Italian poet; was born in Florence, 1265. Of his early days little is known, till, as related in his "Vita Nuova," he first met "the lady of his heart, Beatrice." According to Boccaccio, she was the daughter of Folco Portinari, and married Simone de Bardi and to her Dante was passionately but platonically attached. She died in 1290, and shortly afterwards Dante married Gemma Donati, a daughter of one of the "Guelph" families. In 1289, he fought at Campaldino, and was present at the surrender of Caprona. After filling various minor offices, in 1300, he became one of the six priors of Florence. In 1301, he went as ambassador to Pope Boniface VIII., and never returned to his native town. Charles of Valois aided the Neri or Black Guelphs against their opponents, the Whites, of whom Dante was a supporter, and, in 1302, he was banished. He made many unsuccessful attempts to return, and spent the remaining years of his life wandering from town to town, finally settling in Ravenna, where he died in 1321. His most celebrated work is the "Divina Commedia," and others are the "Vita Nuova," the "Convito," and the "Canzoniere."

Danton (dān'ton), George James, a French advocate, and notorious republican; was born in 1750. He took a leading part in dethroning Louis XVI., and was a prominent actor in the sanguinary scenes that followed. He became a formidable rival to his associate Robespierre.

but was worsted in the strife, and suffered on the guillotine in 1794.

D'Arblay, Francesca Burney, English novelist; born in 1752, was the third child of Dr. Charles Burney. From the age of eighteen to twenty-six she worked at "Evelina," which appeared anonymously in 1778, and won her fame, and the admiration and friendship of Dr. Johnson. "Cecilia" (1782) was not so successful; but her works gained her a position at the court in 1786, and in her "Diary" she gives a graphic description of its decorous dullness. In 1793, she married General D'Arblay, a French refugee. Her later works are "Camille" (1796), "The Wanderer" (1814), and the "Memoirs" of her father. Died, 1840.

Darius, born in 558 B. C.; son of Hystaspes, de-throned Smerdis the usurper, and became King of Persia in 521. He captured Babylon after a siege of twenty months, conquered Thrace, and defeated the Scythians. He sent two armies to Greece to avenge the destruction of Sardis by the Athenians, the first of which was repulsed by the Thracians, and the second by the Athenians at Marathon in 490. He died in B. C. 486, while organizing a third expedition.

Darwin, Charles Robert, an English naturalist; born in Shrewsbury, February 12, 1809; was the son of Dr. Robert Darwin and grandson of Dr. Erasmus Darwin. He was educated at Shrewsbury School, and at the universities of Edinburgh and Cambridge. He early devoted himself to the study of natural history. In 1839, he married his cousin Emma Wedgwood, and henceforth spent the life of a quiet country gentleman, engrossed in scientific pursuits—experimenting, observing, recording, reflecting, and generalizing. In 1859, his name attained its great celebrity by the publication of "The Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection." This work, scouted and derided though it was at first in certain quarters, may be said to have worked nothing less than a revolution in biological science. In it for the first time was given a full exposition of the theory of evolution as applied to plants and animals, the origin of species being explained on the hypothesis of natural selection. The rest of his works are largely based on the material he had accumulated for the elaboration of this great theory. He died April 19, 1882, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Darwin, Erasmus, a poet and physician; born in Eltham near Newark, in 1731. He studied at Cambridge, obtained a doctor's degree at Edinburgh, and settled at Lichfield as a physician. He was a man of great and varied talent, but some of his opinions were deemed extravagantly eccentric. His "Botanic Garden" was admired as a fine specimen of polished verse, and his "Zoonomia," or "The Laws of Organic Life," was admitted to be ingenious, though built upon an hypothesis which was repudiated as absurd. In 1781, he removed from Lichfield to Derby, where he died in 1802.

Davenport, Homer Calvin, cartoonist; born in Silverton, Ore., March 8, 1867; reared on farm in Oregon; never attended art schools; no school education; has been jockey; railroad fireman; clown in circus. Hearst, 1895; since then on "New York Journal"; originated the Mark Hanna $-mark suit of clothes and the giant figure of the trusts in 1899; his work caused attempt to pass anti-cartoon bill in New York, 1897. Author: "Davenport's Cartoons," "The Bell of Silverton," and "Other Short Stories of Oregon," "The Dollar or the Man?"

David (da'-vid), the son of Jesse, of the tribe of Judah; was born in Bethlehem, and flourished in the Eleventh Century, B. C. He watched the flocks of his father, when Samuel was sent by the Most High to Bethlehem, to anoint him King of Israel in the place of Saul whom he had rejected. War having broken out between the Israelites and the Philistines, he fought and vanquished the giant Goliath. Saul gave him the command of a body of men, but having conceived a great hatred of him, he was exposed to imminent danger, and compelled to seek a refuge among the Philistines. After the death of Saul, he was recognized as King of Israel, and defeated the Philistines, the Moabites, the Syrians, and the Ammonites. Many acts of weakness were committed by him, but he obtained forgiveness from the Almighty by exemplary penitence. He transported the ark to Jerusalem, and is the reputed author of many of the psalms.

Davidson, Samuel, born in 1807; biblical critic; was educated in Ireland at the Royal College of Belfast. He entered the Presbyterian ministry, and was called in 1835 to the chair of biblical criticism in his own college. In 1842 he became professor of biblical literature and Oriental languages in the Congregational College at Manchester. He was a member of the Old Testament Revision Committee. Died, 1899.

In 1845 he was elected to Congress, and was appointed colonel of the first regiment of Mississippi volunteers. In 1853 he was secretary of war, and from 1858-61 was again member of the senate. On February 9, 1861, he was unanimously elected "President of the Confederate States of America." War followed, and commenced with a Confederate victory at Bull Run, but the South soon sustained serious reverses, then finances failed, and Grant's defeat of Lee concluded the war. Davis was captured at Irwinsville, and conveyed to Fort Monroe, where he was imprisoned for two years. He was prosecuted in 1867 for treason, was discharged, and his name included in the general amnesty. Died, 1889.

Davis, Richard Harding, novelist, journalist; born in Philadelphia, 1864; son of the late L. Clarke and Rebecca (Harding) Davis; served as war correspondent "London Times" and "New York Herald" in Turkish-Greek, Spanish American, South African, and Russian-Japanese Wars. Plays: "Taming of Helen," "Ranson's Folly," "The Dictator."

Davy, Sir Humphry, born in 1778; English chemist, was a native of Pumphrey. Two papers on nitrous oxide obtained him the post of assistant lecturer on chemistry to the Royal Institution, London, and in a few weeks he was raised to the chief lectureship. In 1803 he became a fellow, and in 1807 secretary of the Royal Society. His Bakerian lecture in 1806 gained him the 3,000 franc prize of the French Institute. In 1815 he invented the miner's safety lamp. He was knighted in 1812, made a baronet and elected president of the Royal Society in 1820. Failing health compelled him to leave England, and he died at Geneva in 1829, from paralysis.

Dawson, Sir John William, geologist and naturalist; was born at Pictou, Nova Scotia, 1820. He studied in Edinburgh, and distinguished himself as a palæontologist. Published, "Story of the Earth and Man," "Origin of the World," and "Geology and History." Dawson called in question the Darwinian theory as to the origin of species. For many years he was chancellor of McGill University, and one of the most noted of Canadian educators. Died, at Montreal, 1899.

Decatur, Stephen, a United States naval commander, born in 1779. On various occasions he was distinguished by his skill and courage. In the war of 1812, between England and America, he captured the "Macedonian" English frigate. In the year 1815, he was taken by the British, after maintaining a running fight for more than two hours. He died in 1820, being shot in a duel which he fought with Commodore Barron.

Defoe (de-fo'), Daniel, a much admired English novelist; born in 1660, was the son of a butcher. In 1688 he kept a hosier's shop in Cornhill, but proving unsuccessful, he was obliged to depend upon his literary powers for a livelihood. He obtained, in 1695, the appointment of accountant to the commissioners of glass duty, which office he held till that duty was repealed in 1701. He was an active writer, but his "Robinson Crusoe," the work for which he was most celebrated, did not appear till 1719. Among his productions may be mentioned "A Journal of the Plague in 1665," by a supposed witness of it. He died in 1731.

De Kalb (kălb), John, Baron, was born about 1732, in Alsace, France. After studying the art of war in the French army, he accompanied Lafayette to America in 1777. After being appointed a major-general by Congress, he served in the field in New Jersey and Maryland, and was second in command to General Gates. He was killed in the battle of Camden, 1780.

Delcasse, Theophile, was born in Pamiers, March 1, 1852, educated in Paris, and began his career as a journalist. He was elected to the chamber in 1889, for Foix; in 1893, became under-secretary for the colonies under MM. Ribot and Dupuy, and colonial minister in the Dupuy cabinet of May, 1894. He has always been a consistent advocate of colonial expansion. When M. Brisson formed his ministry in 1898, he entrusted foreign affairs to M. Delcassé, and it fell to his lot to deal with the difficult position at Fashoda. He retained his portfolio in M. Dupuy's ministry, after the defeat of the Brisson administration. In 1899, he negotiated the agreement with Great Britain as to the Nile Valley and Central Africa, and still remained foreign minister when M. Waldeck-Rousseau succeeded M. Dupuy, and when M. Combes, in 1902, succeeded M. Waldeck-Rousseau. He brought about the rapprochement with Italy, visited England with the president in 1903, and with Lord Lansdowne prepared the Anglo-French Agreement, signed April 8, 1904. The difficulty with Germany about Morocco caused his retirement in 1905.

Delmas, Delphin Michael, lawyer; born in France, April 14, 1844; removed to California in boyhood; graduate of Santa Clara College, California, 1862; graduate of Yale Law School, LL. B., 1865. Y., April 23, 1834; was graduated at Yale College in 1856, and engaged in the presidential campaign for Fremont immediately afterward; studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1858. He was appointed United States minister to Japan, and after holding the commission a month, declined, and began his career as a railroad official as attorney for the New York and Harlem Railroad. He was made attorney and director of the consolidated Hudson River and New York Central railroads in 1869; general counsel of the whole Vanderbilt system in 1875; second vice-president of the reorganized New York Central Railroad in 1882, and president in 1885. His political career, since 1866, embraces his unsuccessful candidacy as lieutenant-governor on the Liberal Republican ticket in 1872; his election by the legislature as a regent of the State University in 1874; his candidacy for United States senator to succeed Thomas C. Platt, in which he withdrew his name after eighty-two days of balloting, in 1881; his declination of the United States senatorship tendered by the Republicans of the legislature in 1884; his candidacy for the presidential nomination in the national convention in 1888; and his election to the United States Senate, January 17, 1899. He has an international reputation as an unusually entertaining speaker, is constantly in request as a lecturer, and has delivered many addresses of large public importance.

De Quincey, Thomas, English essayist; born in Manchester in 1785. His father, Thomas Quincey (not De Quincey), was a merchant, and left his family well provided for. De Quincey was first educated at Salford and at Bath, and afterwards at Winckworth and the Manchester grammar school, from which he ran away, and subsequently went through the adventures and privations which he described in the "Confessions of an English Opium Eater." In 1803, he went up to Worcester College, Oxford, which he left without a degree, and soon after became acquainted with Coleridge and Wordsworth, took a cottage at Grasmere, and became one of the famous Lake scholars. Here he remained for many years, occasionally visiting London and Edinburgh. In 1830, he removed, with his wife and eight children, to the latter place, and lived there till his wife's death, in 1837. He had acquired the habit of taking opium by using it to cure an attack of neuralgia, and so greatly did it grow upon him that he was known to take as many as 12,000 drops, equal to ten wineglasses, in a day. He was engaged in preparing fourteen volumes of his works for the press within a few days of his death. Besides the "Opium Eater," the following works may be mentioned: "Murder Considered as One of the Fine Arts," "Suspiria de Profundis," "The English Mail Coach," and "A Vision of Sudden Death." Died, 1859.

Descartes, Rene (da-kăhrt'), a great French philosopher and mathematician, was born in Touraine in 1596. He early adopted the profession of arms, and served in the armies of the Dutch and Bavarians. In 1629, he settled in Holland, in which country he devoted himself to his favorite studies of the natural and exact sciences. In 1637, he produced his celebrated discourse on the "Method of Reasoning, and of Investigating Scientific Truth"; and, in 1641, he published his "Meditationes de Prima Philosophia," a work of the grandest metaphysical research and speculation, indoctrinating a new system of philosophy named after its author, "Cartesianism." In 1644, appeared his theory of the world as expounded in the "Principia Philosophiæ." In 1647, the French Government gave him a pension of 3,000 livres. About 1648, he proceeded to Sweden upon the invitation of Queen Christina, and died there two years afterwards.

De Soto, Hernando (da-sô'-to), a Spanish explorer; born about 1500, followed the path of Cortez and Pizarro, under the latter of whom he served in Peru. In 1539, he conducted an expedition from Florida, which resulted in the discovery of the Mississippi. Died in Louisiana in 1542.

Dewar, Sir James, F. R. S., Fullerman professor of chemistry, Royal Institution, London; was born in Kincardine, September 20, 1842; educated at Dollar Academy and Edinburgh University; M. A. and Hon. LL. D., Glasgow, St. Andrews, Aberdeen, and Edinburgh; D. Sc., Oxford, Victoria, and Dublin. With Sir Frederick Abel he invented cordite, and he has distinguished himself by his researches into the properties of matter at low temperatures, and into the nature and properties of atmospheric air. He was the first to liquefy and solidify hydrogen. Received French Academy's Lavoisier gold medal, in 1894, and Matteucci medal of Italian Society of Science in 1906; elected foreign member of National Academy of Sciences, Washington, in 1907, and corresponding member of Academy of Sciences in 1907. Knighted, June 24, 1904.

Dewey, George, admiral in United States Navy; born in Montpelier, Vt., December 26, 1837; appointed to Naval Academy, September 23, 1854; graduated in 1858, as passed midshipman; LL. D., University of Pennsylvania, Princeton University, 1898. Attached to steam frigate "Wabash," Mediterranean squadron, until 1861; then to steam sloop "Mississippi" of West Gulf squadron; commissioned lieutenant, April 19, 1861; in Farragut's squadron which forced the passage of Fort St. Philip and Fort Jackson, April, 1862, and participated in the attack on Fort St. Philip and the subsequent fights with gunboats and ironclads, which gave Farragut possession of New Orleans. In the smoke of the battle of Port Hudson, the "Mississippi" lost her bearings and ran ashore under the guns of the land batteries, and the officers and men took to the boats after setting the vessel on fire. Was afterward on several vessels in North Atlantic blockading squadron, then in European squadron, and later on various duties and at different stations, being promoted to commander, April, 1872; captain, September, 1884; commodore, February 9, 1896. In January, 1898, assumed command of Asiatic squadron. On May 1, 1898, in Manila Bay, he commanded in the greatest naval battle since Trafalgar, completely annihilating the Spanish Asiatic squadron under Admiral Montojo, destroying eleven and capturing all other vessels and all the land batteries, without the loss of a man on the American side. Immediately upon receipt of official news of victory he was promoted to rear admiral, and thanked by resolution of Congress; member of United States Philippine Commission, 1899; promoted to admiral, March 2, 1899.

De Witt, John, a Dutch statesman; was born in 1625, at Dort, in Holland. A work, entitled the "Elements of Curved Lines," which he produced at the age of 23, was greatly admired. In 1650, he was chosen pensionary of Dort, and subsequently attained the higher dignity of pensionary of Holland. In 1654, he promoted a perpetual edict for abolishing the office of Stadtholder, and was publicly thanked for his patriotic services. At a later period, Holland being invaded by the French, popular rage was unjustly directed against him, and he, with his brother, Cornelius, were assassinated, with circumstances of great cruelty, by the populace, in 1672.

Díaz, Porfirio, president of Republic of Mexico; was born at Oaxaca, September 15, 1830. Took part in resistance to French invasion, 1863; commander of the Army of the East, 1867; headed an insurrection against the government, 1875; elected president, 1877; since when he held office continuously.

Dickens, Charles, was born in 1812, in Landport, Portsmouth, where his father held a small appointment in the navy pay-office; but when this position was lost the family came to London and Dickens's youth was spent in constant penury and want. For some time he was employed in a blacking factory, but at 12 years of age he was again sent to school, and after three years' tuition he entered an attorney's office. Then he became a shorthand writer, and at 19 obtained the position of parliamentary reporter. During the years 1831 to 1836 he represented various papers — latterly the "Morning Chronicle" — and in 1836 his "Sketches by Boz" were published in a collected form. A publishing firm wishing to produce an illustrated periodical, Dickens undertook the letterpress, and produced the "Pickwick Papers." At the same time he was writing "Oliver Twist." In 1842, he visited America, and wrote on his return the "American Notes." In 1843 he began to publish "Martin Chuzzlewit," which at first fell rather flat, and, in order to economize, Dickens went to live at Genoa. When the "Daily News" was started Dickens was appointed editor, but he retired very soon, and busied himself in further novel-writing — "Dombey and Son," "David Copperfield," "Bleak House," and "Little Dorrit," all being produced between 1846 and 1855. In 1850 he started the periodical "Household Words," afterwards changed to "All the Year Round." In 1858, he separated from his wife. In this year he first appeared as a public reader of his own works, and from 1866 to 1870, he was almost continuously employed in this task, his success being unexampled. In 1867, he made a lecturing tour in America, where he was received with great enthusiasm, despite his unpalatable "American Notes." The strain proved too great for his constitution, and he died (1870), suddenly at his house at Gadshill, leaving his last novel, "Edwin Drood," incomplete.

Dickinson, Jacob M., lawyer, cabinet officer; born Columbus, Miss., 1851; graduate University of Nashville, 1871, A. M., 1872; studied law at Columbia University and Leipsic. Author: "Business Corporations," "Dill on Corporations," "Banking and Trust Company Laws of New Jersey."

Dillon, John, M. P., born in 1851; was educated at the Catholic University of Dublin. He assisted Parnell and Michael Davitt in founding the Land League in America, and in 1880, was elected member of parliament for County Tipperary (a position his father, John Blake Dillon, had previously held). In May, 1881, he was arrested, but in a few months was liberated on the ground of ill-health, and for a time withdrew from the political arena, not sympathizing with Parnell's attitude towards the land act. In 1885 he again took his seat in parliament as member for East Mayo, and in 1886, in consequence of his supporting the "Plan of Campaign," was indicted for conspiracy, and bound over to keep the peace. Under Lord Salisbury's administration of 1886, he took one of the most prominent parts in opposition to the government as a leader of the Irish party, and was twice convicted under the Irish crimes act. After enduring an imprisonment of three months, he went to Australia to collect funds for the Irish party. Returning, he was again, with O'Brien, convicted under the crimes act, but escaped from Ireland in a yacht, and came to America to collect funds. During his absence Parnell's leadership was repudiated by the larger section of the Irish party, and Dillon went to France to endeavor to heal the breach. The negotiations having proved fruitless, he returned to England, and was at once arrested and imprisoned under the sentence passed upon him before his tour in America.

Diogenes (di-ô'-gen-ēs), a philosopher of the school of Cynics; was born in Asia Minor. Becoming a citizen of Athens, he made himself notorious by his abnegation of all social laws and customs, lived upon alms, and took up his abode in a tub. Of his cynicism many well-known anecdotes are related. Died at Corinth, at the age of 90, 325 B. C.

Disraeli (diz-rāl'e), Benjamin, an English statesman and author, was born 1805. He was of Jewish descent, and for years was the leader of the conservative party in the Commons, holding the office of prime minister in 1868-70, and 1874-76. In the latter year he was created Earl of Beaconsfield. Died, 1881.

C., 1887, Boston, 1888-89, New York, 1889-99; popular lyceum lecturer, 1889-1903. Author: "The Leopard's Spots," "The One Woman," "The Clansman," "The Life Worth Living."

Dollinger, Johan Joseph Ignaz, an eminent German theologian; was born 1799. He was leader of the German Catholics who refused to accept the doctrine of the pope's infallibility, and which afterwards founded the Old Catholic sect. Died, 1890.

Dolliver, Jonathan Prentiss, United States senator, lawyer; born near Kingwood, Preston County, W. Va., February 6, 1858; graduated at West Virginia University, 1875; admitted to bar, 1878; established practice in Iowa; member 51st, 52d, 53d, 54th, 55th, and 56th Congresses, tenth Iowa district; appointed United States senator to succeed late Hon. J. H. Gear, August 23, 1900; elected 1902, and reelected, 1907. Has earned a high reputation as an orator and lecturer.

Dore, Paul Gustave, French painter and book illustrator; was born in Strasburg, in 1833, and educated at a Parisian lycée. He became known by his illustrations of "Rabelais" and "Don Quixote," and for some years was a constant contributor to the "Journal pour Rire." At the time of the Crimean War he produced his "Alma" and "Inkermann"; in 1861, he published the first of his famous illustrations to Dante's "Divine Comedy"; and next his illustrations to the "Bible," "Paradise Lost," "The Ancient Mariner," and "The Idylls of the King." These works secured for him a greater reputation in England than was accorded to him in his native country. He afterwards devoted himself to the production of large pictures on religious subjects, such as "The Dream of Pilate's Wife," "The Entry into Jerusalem," and "Ecce Homo." Died, 1883.

Douglas, Stephen Arnold, an American statesman, was born at Brandon, Vermont, in 1813. His early youth was one of poverty; but he managed to spend three years at the Canandaigua Academy, having the study of law in view. In 1833, he went West and settled in Jacksonville, Ill., where he entered on the practice of law, and was chosen attorney-general of the State. He soon after was elected to the legislature, and in 1840 became secretary of state for Illinois. He was judge of the Illinois supreme court from 1841 to 1843, when he resigned, and was chosen to Congress as a Democrat; where he at once became recognized as one of the ablest men of his party. He was opposed to slavery, was strongly opposed to the celebrated Wilmot Proviso, and argued in favor of States' rights. Douglas was elected to the Senate in 1847, and it was as a member of the Senate that he introduced, in 1854, the Kansas-Nebraska bill, which provided that their own citizens should determine whether these territories should become free or slave States. In 1860, the Democratic party split into two divisions, one of which nominated Mr. Douglas for president, and the other John C. Breckenridge. The ensuing election resulted in favor of Mr. Lincoln. Mr. Douglas was strongly opposed to secession, and delivered several addresses on the subject after the outbreak of the Civil War. He died at Chicago, Ill., June 3, 1861.

Douglas, William Lewis, governor, manufacturer; born in Plymouth, Mass., August 22, 1845; educated at brief irregular periods in public schools of Massachusetts; when 5 years old lost father by death; at age of 7 went to work for an uncle, who set him to pegging shoes, and except for a brief return to his mother when 11 years old, worked for uncle eight years; worked in cotton mill at Plymouth at 15, and later in factory at Chiltonville, Mass.; afterward went to Hopkinton and South Braintree, Mass., where he learned bootmaking; at Brockton, 1876, began with small shop, from which he has built up a business with combined capacity of over 15,000 pairs of shoes daily, and owns seventy-five retail shoe stores in large cities selling the "Douglas" shoe.

Member Massachusetts House of Representatives, 1883-84, and of Massachusetts Senate, 1886, 1887; mayor of Brockton, 1891; elected, November, 1904, governor of Massachusetts. Delegate to National Democrat Conventions, 1884, 1892, 1896, delegate-at-large, 1904.

Douglas, Frederick, American orator; was born in 1817, a mulatto slave in Maryland, but he escaped as a young man, and in 1841 began to deliver lectures against slavery, which attracted much attention. In 1846, he made a very successful lecturing tour in England, and, returning to America, he became a newspaper editor. From 1877 to 1881 he was United States marshal for the district of Columbia. Died, 1895.

Doyle, Sir A. Conan, the grandson of John Doyle, the famous political caricaturist "H. B.," was born in Edinburgh in 1859, and educated at Stonyhurst and in Germany. In 1876, he commenced to study medicine at the Edinburgh University, and remained there for five years. From 1882 till 1890, he practiced his profession at Southsea, writing all the while various short stories, some of which have been since published under the title of "The Captain of the Polestar." After "A Study in Scarlet," "Micah Clarke," and "The Sign of Four," came "The White Company," which led to the final abandonment of medicine for literature. "The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes" and "The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes" formed a brilliant series of detective stories. In 1894, he wrote a short play, "A Story of Waterloo," successfully produced by Sir Henry Irving. "The Exploits of Brigadier Gerard" and "Rodney Stone," in 1896, "Uncle Bernac" in 1897, "The Tragedy of the Korosko," a volume of poems ("Songs of Action") in 1898, "A Duet" in 1899, "The Hound of the Baskervilles" in 1902, "The Adventures of Gerard" in 1903, "Return of Sherlock Holmes" in 1904, "Sir Nigel" in 1906, and "Through the Magic Door" in 1907. He volunteered for service in the Transvaal War, and, in 1900, gave his medical services for some months in the hospitals there, afterwards publishing a history of the war, entitled "The Great Boer War." Knighted, June 26, 1902.

Draco (drā'kō) was the first lawgiver of Athens. His code was published in 623 B. C. The laws were severe, and popularly said to have been written in blood.

Drake, Francis, Sir, a distinguished English naval commander, was born in 1540. He circumnavigated the globe under a commission against the Spaniards, destroying many vessels and capturing immense booty in Spanish America. In 1587, he commanded the fleet which destroyed over 100 ships at Cadiz, breaking up a contemplated invasion of England. He was made vice-admiral, and commanded in the battle, in 1588, which destroyed the Spanish Armada. Died, 1595.

Draper, John William (drā'pur), an American chemist, physiologist, and author, was born in England, in 1811. He took his degree of M. D. at the University of Pennsylvania in 1836; became successively professor of natural sciences in Hampden-Sidney College, Virginia, and, in 1841, professor of chemistry in New York University, and, in 1850, of physiology. Of his numerous works we may mention "Human Physiology, Statical and Dynamical; or the Conditions and Course of the Life of Man," in 1856; and a "History of the American Civil War," in 1867-68. Died, 1882.

Dryden, John (drī'dn), an English poet; was born in 1631. After graduating at Cambridge, he entered upon a literary career, and succeeded Sir William Davenant as poet-laureate in 1668. His "Essay on Dramatic Poesy," according to Dr. Johnson, created the school of English criticism. Dryden, by his dramas and political satires,—especially his "Absalom and Achitophel" (1681)—stands at the head of English poets of the second rank, and his works have elicited high eulogy from such judges as Pope, Scott, Macaulay, and Brougham. Died, 1700.

Dumas, Alexandre, the Elder, a celebrated French author, born in Villers-Cotterets, 1802, son of General Dumas, a Creole; lost his father at four, and led for a time a miscellaneous life, till, driven by poverty, he went to Paris to seek his fortune; there he soon made his mark, and became by-and-by the most popular dramatist and romancer of his time; his romances are numerous, and he reached the climax of his fame by the production of "Monte Cristo" in 1844, and the "Three Musketeers" the year after; he was unhappy in his marriage, and with his wife, as afterwards, he squandered his fortune in reckless extravagance; before the end it was all spent, and he died at Dieppe, broken in health and impaired in intellect, ministered to by his son and daughter. Died, 1870.

Dumas, Alexandre, born in 1824; son of the preceding, and, like him, a novelist and dramatist, accompanied his father in a voyage to the Mediterranean in 1846, and, in 1848, produced the work which made his reputation — "La Dame aux Camélias," a novel which drew the encomium of his own father. Since then his work has been chiefly dramatic, and includes such plays as the "Demi-Monde," "La Princesse Georges," "Monsieur Alphonse," and "Denise." In 1874, he was admitted as a member to the French Academy. Died, 1895.

Du Maurier, George Louis Palmella Busson, artist and draughtsman; born in Paris in 1834, but educated in London, Belgium, and the Netherlands. For many years a valuable contributor to "Punch," at the same time illustrating many other books and magazines. His mode of satirizing the extravagances of the so-called "Æsthetic" school and other society foibles, have procured for him a high reputation. In 1891, he published a novel, "Peter Ibbetson," followed by "Trilby." Died, 1896.

Dunne, Finley Peter, journalist, author; born in Chicago, July 10, 1867; educated in Chicago public schools; entered newspaper life as reporter, in 1885 served on various papers; on editorial staff of "Chicago Evening Post" and "Times-Herald," 1892-97; editor of "Chicago Journal," 1897-1900. Author; "Mr. Dooley in Peace and in War," "Mr. Dooley in the Hearts of His Countrymen," "Mr. Dooley's Philosophy," "Mr. Dooley's Opinions," "Observations by Mr. Dooley."

Duns Scotus, born in 1265; divine and writer. Residing in Paris, he occupied there the post of head of the theological schools, and was known as the "Subtle Doctor." He was the first to promulgate the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. At one time a follower of Thomas Aquinas, he later founded a school of his own in antagonism to the system of Aquinas. Died, 1308.

Duse, Eleonora, Italian actress of the first rank, was born in Vigevano, October 3, 1861. She appeared about 1880, on the Italian, chiefly Roman, stage, as leading lady in the plays of Dumas and Sardou, but afterwards played parts of greater depth. She earned golden opinions by her combined force and gracefulness; in 1892, appearing at Vienna and Berlin; in 1893, at New York, and her recent visits to England have, by an unanimous accord, reaffirmed her triumphs. Although she appears chiefly in grave parts ("Magda," "Nora," "Adrienne Lecouvreur"), her versatility has also allowed her to please in the lighter vein of Dumas' "Francillon," and as the hostess in Goldoni's "Locandiera." More recently she has produced d'Annunzio's "Gioconda" and "Francesca da Rimini."

Dwight, Timothy, born in 1752; American divine, served as army chaplain in the Continental army, and, after working on a farm, was ordained a minister. In 1795, he became president of Yale College. He wrote "The Conquest of Canaan," an epic poem, "Theology Explained and Defended," etc. Died, 1817.

Eads, James Buchanan, born in 1820; American engineer, constructed the steel bridge over the Mississippi at St. Louis (completed, 1874); partly carried out a plan of deepening the Mississippi by means of jetties, and was engaged at his death in planning a ship-canal over the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. Died, 1887.

Early, Jubal A., born in 1816; American general and lawyer, served in the Mexican War, and on the Confederate side in the American Civil War, holding Fredericksburg in 1863 and commanding a division at Gettysburg. He has published "Memoirs of the Last Year of the War." Died, 1894.

Eddy, Mary Baker Glover, founder of Christian Science, was born in Bow, N. H., on July 16, 1822; she received a public school education, and was connected with the Congregational Church till 1866, when she discovered what are known as the principles of Christian Science. In 1867 she began to teach them, and in 1879 founded the Church of Christ (Christian Scientist) in Boston, Mass. In 1881 she was ordained to the ministry; in the same year established the Massachusetts Metaphysical College in Boston; and in 1883 started the "Christian Science Journal." She is the author of "Science and Health, With Key to the Scriptures" (the Christian Science text-book); "Unity of Good"; "No and Yes"; "Rudimental Divine Science"; "Manual of the Mother Church," and other works on related subjects. In 1908, Mrs. Eddy gave $1,000,000 for the establishment of a Christian Science Institution for the promotion of the welfare of mankind.

Edison, Thomas Alva, electrician; was born at Milan, O., February 11, 1847; received some instruction from his mother (Ph. D., Union, 1878); at 12 years of age, became newsboy on Grand Trunk Railway; later, learned telegraphy; worked as operator at various places in United States and Canada; invented many telegraphic appliances, including automatic repeater, quadruplex telegraph, printing telegraph, etc. Established workshop at Newark, N. J., removing to Menlo Park, N. J., 1876, and later to West Orange, N. J. Invented machines for quadruplex and sextuplex telegraphic transmission; the carbon telegraph transmitter; the microtasimeter for detection of small changes in temperature; the megaphone, to magnify sound; the phonograph; the aërophone; the incandescent lamp and light system; the kinetoscope; also scores of other inventions. Was made chevalier, officer, and afterwards commandant, of Legion of Honor, by French Government; appointed, 1903, honorary chief consulting engineer of Louisiana Purchase Exposition, St. Louis.

Edward, the name of ten kings of England. Of them, three belong to the Anglo-Saxon line. Edward I., "the Elder," son and successor of Alfred the Great, crowned 901, died 925. Edward II., "the Martyr," great-grandson of the former, succeeded his father Edgar, 975, and was assassinated by direction of his step-mother Elfrida, 978. Edward III., "the Confessor," who succeeded his half-brother Edmund Ironsides, 1042, died 1066. In the Plantagenet line there were five of the name; Edward I., "Longshanks," who succeeded his father, Henry III., 1274, died in 1307. Edward II., his son, born in Wales, was the first to assume the title of Prince of Wales, since bestowed upon the heir to the throne. He succeeded his father, 1307, and was murdered by Roger de Mortimer, paramour of his queen, Isabella of France, 1327. Edward III., his son and successor, born in 1312, died in 1377. Edward IV., son of Richard, Duke of York, great-great-grandson of Edward III., was born in Rouen, France, 1441, and claimed the throne in right of his mother and as the head of the house of York, in opposition to Henry VI., king de jure, representing the house of Lancaster. The long and bloody civil "War of the Roses" ensued, Edward finally vanquishing his enemies. Died in 1483. Edward V., his son and successor, born 1470, was murdered along with his younger brother in the Tower of London, 1483, by order of their uncle, Richard, Duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III. In the Tudor line there was but one of the name — Edward VI., only son of Henry VIII. by Jane Seymour, born in 1537. He succeeded his father, 1547, and died in 1553. Edward VII., son of Victoria and Albert Edward.

Edward "the Confessor" was born about 1004, son of Ethelred the Unready and Emma, daughter of Richard the Fearless, Duke of Normandy, was brought up at the Norman court, and after his accession, on the death of Hardicanute, in 1042, showed a preference for Norman customs and ideas. Outrages were committed with impunity by his Norman favorites, while the English earls, Leofric of Mercia, and Godwine of Wessex, were engaged in private quarrels. At last, in 1052, Godwine, who had been outlawed, rose in rebellion, installed Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury, in place of Robert of Jumièges, who had fled with the other Normans, and during the rest of the reign all real power was in the hands of the House of Godwine. Edward codified the customary law of the Anglo-Saxons, which thus became known as the "laws of King Edward." Died 1066.

Edward I., King of England, born 1239, succeeded his father, Henry III., in 1272. Imbued with high notions of feudal sovereignty, he sought to establish his supremacy throughout the island of Britain. His expeditions against Llewellyn-ap-Gruffydd, Prince of Wales (1282), and his brother, David (1283), resulted in the reduction of the principality, the government of which he settled by the statute of Wales (1284). The struggle between John Baliol and Robert Bruce for the throne of Scotland gave him a pretext for interfering in that country (1290). After vainly endeavoring to maintain Baliol as his vassal, he set to work to conquer Scotland for himself, sending the Earl of Warrenne thither as viceroy, but was forced to contend with a succession of claimants, and died near Carlisle, whilst marching against William Wallace. A man of strictly legal, but somewhat narrow mind, he secured order and good government by the Statutes of Winchester and Westminster and other enactments, and carried on Simon de Montfort's work of molding the English Parliament (1295), though, at the same time, somewhat inclined to strain the royal prerogative. His personal character was extremely high. Died, 1307.

Edward VII., King of Great Britain and Ireland, Emperor of India, born November 9, 1841. He studied at Edinburgh, and afterwards attended the public lectures at Oxford and Cambridge. In the summer of 1860 he paid a visit to the United States and Canada. Two years later he traveled in the East and visited Jerusalem. On March 10, 1863, he married Princess Alexandra of Denmark, the surviving issue being one son and three daughters. Late in 1871, he suffered from a dangerous attack of typhoid fever, and his recovery in February, 1872, was celebrated by a national thanksgiving festival. Between November, 1875, and March, 1876, the prince was engaged in a grand tour of India. He has taken a great interest in exhibitions and institutions, as the Colonial and Indian Exhibitions, the Royal College of Music, and Imperial Institute. Ascended throne as Edward VII., January 22, 1901.

Edwards, Jonathan, was born at East Windsor, Connecticut, October 5, 1703. He was a celebrated metaphysician and divine, chiefly remembered as the author of a treatise on "The Freedom of the Will." He was the author, however, of several other treatises, especially of one on the "Religious Affections," and of a "History of Redemption," which have been many times republished. At the time of his death he had just been appointed to the presidency of Princeton College, New Jersey. As a preacher, Edwards was especially famous; and, according to some authorities, he ranks by his writings, in the Calvinistic school of theology, amongst the greatest luminaries of the Christian Church. Died, 1758.

Egan, Maurice Francis, educator, author, diplomat; born in Philadelphia, May 24, 1852; graduated at La Salle College; entered Georgetown, D. C., College, 1875 (A. M., LL. D.); afterward sub-editor, consecutively, of McGee's "Illustrated Weekly," "Catholic Review," and (editor) "Freeman's Journal"; professor of English literature, University of Notre Dame, Ind.; J. U. D., Ottawa University, 1891. Author: "A Garden of Roses," "Stories of Duty," "The Life Around Us," "The Theater and Christian Parents." Translator (for Mr. Augustin Daly), of "Coppée's Pater," "Modern Novelists," "Lectures on English Literature," "A Gentleman," "Jack Chumleigh," "Jack Chumleigh at Boarding School," "A Primer of English Literature," "The Disappearance of John Longworthy," "A Marriage of Reason," "The Success of Patrick Desmond," "The Flower of the Flock," "Preludes" (poems); "Songs and Sonnets," and other poems; "The Vocation of Edward Conway," "The Châtelaine of the Roses," "Jasper Thorne," "In a Brazilian Forest," "The Leopard of Lancianus," "Studies in Literature," "The Watson Girls," "Belinda," "Belinda's Cousins," "The Sexton Maginnis Stories." One of the editors of "The World's Best Literature," "Encyclopedia of Irish Literature," etc. In 1907, appointed United States minister to Denmark.

Egmont, Lamoral, Count, Prince de Gavre, Flemish noble, was born in 1522; accompanied Charles V. on his expedition to Africa (1544), and distinguished himself against the French in the battles of St. Quentin and Gravelines. During the regency of the Duchess of Parma he sought to mediate between her and the people of the Netherlands. Becoming obnoxious to Philip II., owing to his connection with the Prince of Orange, he was seized and executed at Brussels by the Duke of Alba. Died, 1568.

Eiffel, Gustave (i'-fel), an eminent French engineer, born at Dijon, 1832; early obtained a reputation for bridge construction; designed the great Garabit viaduct, and also the enormous locks for the Panama canal; his most noted work is the gigantic iron tower which bears his name; in 1893 became involved in the Panama scandals, and was fined, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment.

Eldon, John Scott, Earl of, was born 1751, son of a Newcastle coalfitter; after a successful career at Oxford, entered the Middle Temple (1773), and was called to the bar (1776); entered parliament as a supporter of Pitt (1783); became solicitor-general (1787), and as attorney-general (1793) prosecuted Thelwall, Horne Tooke, and other revolutionary agitators. He became chief justice of the Common Pleas in 1799, and was lord chancellor from 1801 to 1806, and 1807 to 1827. In politics he was an unbending Tory, opposing all improvements in the law or constitution. Died, 1838.

Eliot, Charles William, born in Boston, Mass., March 20, 1834; graduated at Harvard in 1853. He taught mathematics and chemistry at Harvard, and in 1863 he went to Europe for study of chemistry and to investigate the educational institutions of that continent. While at Vienna was chosen in 1865 professor of analytical chemistry in Massachusetts Institute of Technology, which post he filled for a period of four years and again went to Europe and spent fourteen months in further investigation, mainly in France. In 1869, Dr. Eliot succeeded Dr. Thomas Hill as president of Harvard College, and continued at its head until 1909. During his administration many notable changes in the government of the college occurred, its scope was broadened and there was a great increase in the number of its professors and students, while its wealth by gifts and benefactions was greatly increased, so that now it more than successfully competes with the great European universities in its curriculum. Mr. Eliot was given the degree of LL. D. by Williams and Princeton colleges in 1869, and by Yale in 1870, and is an honored member of many scientific and literary bodies. Beside numerous addresses, chemical memoirs, and technical investigations, he published in conjunction with Prof. F. H. Storer a "Manual of Inorganic Chemistry," and a "Manual of Qualitative Chemical Analysis." More recently he published "American Contributions to Civilization," "Educational Reform," and "Charles Eliot: Landscape Architect."

Eliot, George, the nom de plume of Marian Evans, the great English novelist. She was born in Warwickshire, England, November 22, 1819. She received a superior education, and became familiar with Latin, German, and the higher mathematics. In 1844-46 she translated Strauss' "Leben Jesu," and later Spinoza's "Ethics," and other works. In 1851 she became assistant editor of the "Westminster Review." At this time she first met George Henry Lewes, and with him she formed a connection, only terminated by his death in 1878. Lewes had been married many years, but his wife proved unfaithful. He condoned her offense by taking her back to his home, and, when she left him finally, he was unable, by reason of the condonation, to secure a divorce under the law of England. Under these circumstances, and after due deliberation, Lewes and Miss Evans decided to live together.

In 1857, the first of the "Scenes of Clerical Life" appeared in "Blackwood," and in 1858 "Adam Bede" was published. This magnificent piece of work at once placed its author in the front rank of living writers. It was followed in succession by "The Mill on the Floss," "Silas Marner," "Romola," and "Felix Holt," the latter appearing in 1866. George Eliot published her first poem, "The Spanish Gypsy," but neither this nor others which followed proved as successful as her prose writings. "Middlemarch," by many considered as even superior to "Adam Bede," was issued in 1871, and five years later appeared "Daniel Deronda," a much inferior work. Mr. Lewes died in November, 1878, and Miss Evans married on May 6, 1880, a stockbroker, named John Cross, a man much younger than herself. Died, 1880.

Elizabeth, Queen of England, daughter of Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn, was born 1533. Her education was entrusted to the most learned men of the age, and she became an accomplished scholar. During the reign of her sister Mary she was imprisoned for a time in the Tower. On her accession (1558), Mary's enactments in favor of Romanism were abrogated; by the Act of Supremacy the sovereign again became head of the Church, and a form of worship was established which, it was hoped, would conciliate moderate men of all parties. At first the spirit of discontent dared not show itself amidst the general satisfaction. But after the escape of Mary Stuart into England (1568), her presence in the country was a constant source of disquiet. She was the heir to the throne, and as Elizabeth persistently refused to marry, it seemed probable that she would be her successor. The disaffected Papists were further encouraged by the sentence of excommunication pronounced against Elizabeth by the Pope, and by the triumph of their cause abroad; Jesuits from Douay traversed the country in disguise, several plots were formed, and it became necessary to put the penal enactments against Recusants more stringently in force. The Protestantism of the country was acutely aroused, and a strong party in the council urged the queen to put herself forward as the champion of the Reformed faith on the Continent. But Elizabeth chose rather to encourage a feeling of independence and energy at home than to involve England in foreign complications; the prudence and patriotism of her policy were fully proved by the after history of her reign. The growing feeling of nationality proved stronger than the lingering attachment to the old faith, especially after the hopes of the Roman Catholics had been dashed by the execution of Mary (1587), and when Philip of Spain sent his long-projected expedition against England (1588) Papists as well as Protestants came zealously forward in defense of the realm. During the latter part of the reign, the disturbances created by the Puritans foreshadowed the troubles of the opening century. Died, 1603.

Elizabeth, St., of Hungary, was born 1207, a daughter of Andrew II., King of Hungary, and the wife of Louis IV., Landgrave of Thuringia. Left a widow after six years of marriage, and when she was only twenty years of age, she was deprived of her regency by her husband's brother Henry, and lived for some time in great poverty. Ultimately, the regency was once more offered to her, and her son Hermann was declared heir to the throne; but she preferred henceforth to live in retirement at Marburg, and to devote herself to works of piety under the direction of her confessor Conrad. Died, 1231.

Elliott, Maxine (Mrs. N. C. Goodwin), actress; born in Rockland, Me.; made début with E. S. Willard in small parts; soon after played leading parts in Rose Coghlan's company; was under Augustin Daly's management two seasons; later played in Nathan Hale as co-star with her husband, Nat. C. Goodwin, from whom she was divorced in 1908.

Ellsworth, Oliver, jurist, was born in Windsor, Conn., April 29, 1745. He became prominent in State affairs and in the Continental Congress, and was a member of the federal convention of 1787, which prepared the constitution of the United States. It was on his motion that the words "National government" in that organic act were replaced by the definition "Government of the United States." He became United States senator from Connecticut in 1789, and was chairman of the committee which organized the federal judicial system. He led the Federalist party in the Senate, and was an earnest advocate of Jay's treaty with England in 1794. From 1796 to 1799 he was chief justice of the United States Supreme Court, and in 1800 negotiated, with Patrick Henry and Governor Davie, a treaty with France. He afterward served on the governor's council of Connecticut, and in May, 1807, became chief justice of the State Supreme Court. Died, 1807.

Emerson, Ralph Waldo, an American poet and prose writer, born at Boston in 1803. He graduated at Harvard in 1821, for five years taught in a school, and in 1829 became minister to a Unitarian church in Boston, but in 1832 resigned his charge. He spent the greater part of 1833 in Europe, and on his return began his career as a lecturer on various subjects, in which capacity he acted for a long series of years. In 1835 he took up his permanent residence at Concord, Mass., and in 1836 published a small volume called "Nature." He was one of the original editors of the Dial, a transcendental magazine begun in 1840. Two volumes of his essays were published in 1841 and 1844, and his poems in 1846. His miscellaneous addresses had been published in England in 1844, and on visiting Great Britain in 1847 he was welcomed by a large circle of admirers. In 1850, he published "Representative Men"; in 1856, "English Traits"; in 1860, "The Conduct of Life"; in 1869, "May Day and Other Poems," and "Society and Solitude"; in 1871, "Parnassus," a collection of poems; in 1876, "Letters and Social Aims." Emerson showed certain similarities with Carlyle, of whom he was a friend and correspondent. Their correspondence appeared in 1883. He was one of the most original and influential writers that the United States has produced. Died, 1882.

Emmanuel, Filibert, Duke of Savoy, son of Charles III., born 1528, was commander-in-chief of the imperial troops in Italy against the French, who, on his father's death, seized most of his inheritance; appointed governor of the Netherlands by Philip II. in 1556, he attacked France, winning the battle of St. Quentin, and by the Treaty of Château-Cambresis (1559) recovered his ancestral domains, and married Marguerite, sister of the King of France. He applied himself to the administrative and military organization of his country, and is considered the founder of the Sardinian monarchy. Died, 1580.

Emmett, Robert, Irish revolutionist, born 1778; son of a Dublin doctor; expelled from Dublin University in 1798 owing to his anti-English sympathies; in 1803 led an unsuccessful attack on Dublin Castle; escaped into Wicklow, but was captured and executed. His fate is the subject of some verses by Moore. Died, 1803.

Epictetus, a Stoic philosopher of the 1st century, A. D., born at Hierapolis in Phrygia; was bought as a slave by Epaphroditus, a favorite of Nero. When emancipated he lived at Rome, until banished by Domitian, and then became a teacher at Nicopolis in Epirus. His lectures were transcribed by his pupil, Arrian.

Epicurus, Greek philosopher, was born about 340 B. C. It is doubtful whether his birth occurred before or after his parents' removal from Gargettus, in Attica, to Samos. His youth was spent in that island, whence he removed to Athens, when about eighteen, and afterwards taught at Colophon, Mitylene, and Lampsacus. He returned to Athens about 304, and remained there till his death. He was founder of the Epicurean school, who hold that the summum bonum consists in pleasure—chiefly mental pleasure. Died, 270 B. C.

Erasmus, Desiderius, one of the greatest scholars of the Renaissance; born in 1467, at Rotterdam; on his parents' death entered a monastery, which he left to become a teacher at Paris, and, at the invitation of his pupil, Lord Mountjoy, came to England. He settled at Oxford, where he became the friend of More, and studied divinity under Colet, and Greek under Grocyn and Linacre. In 1506 he visited Italy, staying at Bologna and Rome, where he was warmly received, but returned to England, and was made Margaret professor of divinity and professor of Greek at Cambridge. He returned to the Continent, and, after a journey to the Low Countries, settled at Basle, where he published his edition of the New Testament. Erasmus was in favor of moderate reform in the church, as is shown by his "Enchiridion Militis Christiani" and "Encomium Moriae," but he gave little support to Luther, although he refused to write against him. Died, 1536.

Eric the Red, a Norwegian navigator, who, in 982, located on the island of Iceland. In 983 he sailed from Bredifjord to reach some western shore said to have been visited by one of his countrymen in former times. On the voyage he passed Cape Farewell, and on the coast met with reindeer. He named the country Greenland and the inlet Ericfjord. Returning to Iceland in 985, he interested the people of the island in his discovery, and with twenty-five sail set out for the voyage. Some of the ships were lost in a storm, and others were driven home; but he succeeded in reaching the Greenland coast with fourteen, and located on the fiord, at some distance from the ocean, where there was grass and trees. About twelve years later his son Lief is said to have discovered the continent of North America, which he called Markland and Vinland.

Ericsson, John, engineer, born in Lantzbanshyttan, Sweden, January 31, 1803. At the age of twelve he became cadet of engineers, and at seventeen entered the Swedish army; in 1827 he was promoted captain. In 1828 he constructed a flame engine, and went to London to introduce it, resigning his captaincy in the army. He also produced in succession an instrument for sea-sounding, a hydrostatic weighing machine, and a tubular steam boiler, besides other important devices. In 1833 he constructed the caloric engine, and in 1853 the ship "Ericsson," of 2,000 tons, propelled by this motor. In 1836 Ericsson invented and patented the screw propeller, and in 1839 he came to the United States, where, in 1841, he designed for the government the screw-propelled war ship "Princeton." This was the pioneer screw war ship; she carried a twelve-inch wrought-iron gun, designed by Ericsson, and a wrought-iron gun carriage, which took up the recoil without breaking. In 1861 he built for the United States Government, in 100 days, the iron-clad "Monitor," which, on March 9, 1862, in Hampton Roads, defeated the Confederate iron-clad ram "Merrimac." In 1881 he built for the United States a vessel called the "Destroyer." His recent scientific investigations included computations of the influences that retard the earth's rotary motion, and the intensity of solar heat. Died, 1889.

Erskine, Thomas, Lord, born in 1750; son of the tenth Earl of Buchan; after serving in the army and navy, was called to the bar in 1778, and soon won renown as an advocate by his defense of Lord Keppel and of Lord George Gordon. A strong Whig, he acted for the defense in the political trials of the time, giving his aid to Horne Tooke, Thelwall, and Tom Paine; his defense of the latter cost him the post of attorney-general to the Prince of Wales. He was now regarded as the defender of popular liberties and constitutional rights. From 1790, he sat in parliament as a supporter of Fox; in 1806, became chancellor under him, and was raised to the peerage. Henceforward he took little part in politics, but vigorously supported Queen Caroline in 1821. Died, 1823.

Estaing, Charles Hector, Count d', born in 1729; French admiral; after serving in the army in India, under the Marquis de Bussy, and being made prisoner at the siege of Madras, entered the navy, and led an expedition to Sumatra, capturing several English forts. Placed in command of a squadron sent to aid the United States against England, he captured the Isle of Grenada, but ultimately met with reverses, and returned to France in disgrace. He was guillotined during the Revolution. Died, 1794.

Euclid of Alexandria, a celebrated geometrician. Little is known of his life. According to Proclus, he lived from 328 to 283 B. C., and was one of the Platonic school. He is said to have written other works besides the "Elements of Geometry."

Eugene, Francois, Prince of Savoy; born in 1663, son of Eugene Maurice, Count of Soissons; joined the Austrian service; distinguished himself against the Turks in 1683, and was present at the siege of Belgrade, in 1688. After serving against the French, and defeating Catinat in Italy, he overthrew the Turks at Zenta. Again opposed to the French in the War of Succession he captured Villeroy at Cremona, and joined Marlborough in 1704, taking part in the battle of Blenheim. He then went to Italy, and was defeated at Cassano (1705), but soon afterwards gained a victory, and relieved Turin. In 1708, he joined Marlborough in Flanders, and was present at Oudenarde and Malplaquet. He again distinguished himself against the Turks at the battles of Peterwaradin and Belgrade. Died, 1736.

Euler, Leonhard, mathematician; born in Basle in 1707; was invited by Catherine II. to Russia in 1727, and taught mathematics at St. Petersburg. In 1741, he went to Berlin, but returned to St. Petersburg in 1766. His writings are numerous and valuable. Died, 1783.

Euripides, Greek tragedian; born in Salamis in 480 B. C.; rival and contemporary of Sophocles, and friend of Socrates; studied under Anaxagoras, and produced his first tragedy in 455. He sought in Macedonia a refuge from the satire of Aristophanes. Among his works are the "Alcestis," "Hecuba," and "Medea." Died, 406 B. C.

Eusebius, Pamphili (ū-sē'-be-us), a celebrated divine honored with the title of "Father of Ecclesiastical History," was born in Caesarea in 266. He was bishop of his native city from 314 till his death, about 340.

Eustachio, Bartolommeo (ūs-tāsh'-e-ō), an Italian physician of the Sixteenth Century, settled in Rome, and made several anatomical discoveries, among others those of the tube from the middle ear to the mouth, and a valve on the wall of the right auricle of the heart, both called "Eustachian" after him.

Evans, Robley Dunglison, officer of United States Navy; born in Floyd County, Va., August 18, 1846; educated in public schools of Washington; appointed to the United States Navy for Utah, September 20, 1860; graduate of United States Naval Academy, 1863; rear admiral, February 11, 1901. During the Civil War he participated in both attacks on Fort Fisher, January 15, 1865, and in land attack received four severe rifle-shot wounds. When in command of the "Yorktown" at Valparaiso, Chile, 1891, during period of strained relations between Chile and United States, his actions in connection with various incidents earned him his popular name of "Fighting Bob." In war with Spain, commander of "Iowa" in Sampson's fleet off Santiago, taking active part in battle with Cervera's fleet, July 3, 1898; was president of Board of Inspection and Survey; commander-in-chief at Asiatic Station, October, 1902, and in command of the Asiatic expedition, 1908. Author: "A Sailor's Log."

Ev'ere'tt, Alexander Hill, an American litterateur and diplomatist, was born in Massachusetts in 1792, and died while commissioner to China, in 1847. He was minister to Russia, Holland, and Spain.

Everett, Edward, born in 1794; American author and statesman, brother of the preceding; became professor of Greek at Harvard in 1815; traveled in Europe from 1815 to 1818; became editor of the "North American Review," and was a member of Congress from 1824 to 1834; governor of Massachusetts from 1835 to 1839; and from 1840 to 1845, minister-plenipotentiary to England, in which capacity he succeeded in adjusting several delicate matters. He became secretary of state in 1852, and was elected to the senate in 1853. He wrote "The Dirge of Alaric the Visigoth" (a poem), "Lives of Washington and General Stark," and other works, but was best known as an orator. Died, 1865.

Ezekiel (e-ze'-ke-el), one of the four great Hebrew prophets, was the son of Buzi, and one of the sacerdotal race. He was carried to Babylon as a captive by Nebuchadnezzar, 598 B. C. Favored by the Almighty with the gift of prophecy, he soothed, and comforted, and admonished his countrymen, till at length he was stoned to death by order of the Babylonian authorities.

Fabius, Maximus Quintus, born about 275 B. C.; Roman general, was great-grandson of the preceding, and was surnamed "Cunctator" because, having, in 217, been appointed dictator for the second time and entrusted with the defense of Italy against the victorious Hannibal, he pursued a course of cautious and patient generalship, never risking a general engagement with his opponent, but cutting off his supplies, and gradually wearying him out, and meeting with signal success. Before his appointment to the dictatorship, he was five times consul. Died, 203 B. C.

Fahrenheit, Gabriel Daniel, born in 1686; Prussian experimental philosopher; after traveling in England, Germany, and France, settled in Holland. About 1714, it occurred to him to use quicksilver instead of spirits of wine in the construction of thermometers. By this substitution the accuracy of the instrument was greatly enhanced. In 1724, he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society of London, and in the "Philosophical Transactions" of that year there appeared several papers from his pen. Died, 1736.

Fairbanks, Charles Warren, vice-president of the United States; born on a farm near Unionville Center, Union County, O., May 11, 1852; graduate of Ohio Wesleyan University, Delaware, O., 1872; admitted to Ohio bar, 1874, and established practice at Indianapolis. Was Republican caucus nominee for United States senator, 1893, but defeated by David Turpie, Democrat. Appointed, in 1898, member of Joint High British-American Commission, and chairman of American commissioners. Elected United States senator from Indiana, 1897, and reelected in 1903; elected vice-president, in 1904; term expires in 1909.

Fairfax, Thomas, Lord, an English parliamentary general, was born in Yorkshire, in 1612. After serving with distinction in the Low Countries, Lord Fairfax was declared general-in-chief of the parliament army at the opening of the civil war, in 1642, and again in 1645. He distinguished himself in most of the great battles and sieges of that struggle, and after its close refused to act as one of the judges of Charles I. In 1659, Lord Fairfax used all his influence with the army to promote the restoration of Charles II. Died, 1671.

Falconio, Diomede, Archbishop and apostolic delegate; born in Pescocostanzo, in the Abruzzi, Italy; entered Franciscan Order, September 2, 1860; on completion of studies, November, 1865, sent as missionary to United States; ordained priest, January 4, 1866, by Bishop Timon, of Buffalo; professor of philosophy and vice-president of St. Bonaventure's College, Allegheny, N. Y., 1866; professor of theology and secretary of Franciscan Province of the Immaculate Conception, 1867; president of college and seminary of St. Bonaventure, 1868; became citizen of United States, 1868; secretary and administrator of cathedral at Harbor Grace, Newfoundland, 1872-82; in United States, 1882-83; returned to Italy, 1883, and elected provincial of Franciscans in the Abruzzi; later reelected and was also commissary and visitor-general, Province of Naples, 1888; synodical examiner in diocese of Aquila; commissary and visitor-general Franciscan Province in Puglia, 1889; procurator-general Franciscan Order and visitor-general in various provinces of the Order, 1889-92. A volume of his "Pastoral Letters" (translated into French) published in Canada, 1900.

Faraday, Michael (fär'ah-da), one of the most eminent of English chemists and physicists, was born in Surrey, in 1791. In 1833, he became professor of chemistry in the Royal Institution, London, where his lectures attracted the admiration of European and American savans. Faraday's great fame principally rests upon his discoveries in electricity and electro-magnetism. Of the latter science he may truly be termed the founder. His earlier writings have been collected into three volumes, entitled "Experimental Researches in Electricity"; and, among his later works, "Experimental Researches in Chemistry and Physics." Died, 1867.

Farragut, David Glasgow, a famous American admiral, of Spanish extraction; born at Knoxville, Tennessee, 1801; entered the navy as a boy; rose to be captain in 1855, and at the outbreak of the Civil War attached himself to the Union; distinguished himself by his daring capture of New Orleans; in 1862 was created rear-admiral, and two years later gained a signal victory over the Confederate fleet at Mobile Bay; was raised to the rank of admiral in 1866, being the first man to hold this position in the American Navy. Died, 1870.

Fenelon (fēn'-a-lōng), Francois de Salignac de la Mothe, an eminent French divine and writer; was born in 1651, and died in 1715.

Ferdinand I., "the Great," King of Castile, of Leon and Galicia; was the second son of Sancho III., King of Navarre and Castile, and succeeded to the latter kingdom in 1035. He was one of the most powerful monarchs of his age, and disputed with Henry III. of Germany for the imperial crown. Died, 1065.

Ferdinand V. of Castile, III. of Naples, and II. of Aragon and Sicily, surnamed "the Catholic." He was the son of John II., and succeeded his father on the throne of Aragon and Sicily in 1466. In 1469 he was married to Isabella, sister of Henry IV. of Castile, and in 1479 became, through her, King of Castile, Isabella sharing with him the royal dignity. The reign of Ferdinand and Isabella was signalized by the discovery of America by Columbus. Ferdinand died in 1516, Isabella having died twelve years before him. After the death of Isabella, he acted simply as regent of the kingdom, having handed over the crown to his daughter Juana, in accordance with the will of Isabella.

Fichte (fik'ta), Johann Gottlieb, one of the most eminent German thinkers and philosophers; was born in Upper Lusatia in 1762, and received his education in the universities of Jena, Leipzig, and Wittenberg. At Königsberg, where his friendship with Kant commenced, his first published work, "An Attempt at a Criticism of all Revelation," appeared. The celebrity he thus acquired obtained for Fichte the professional chair of philosophy at Jena, which post he resigned in 1799, in consequence of atheistic views being attributed to him in connection with the new doctrine of metaphysics he had introduced. In 1810, Fichte became professor of philosophy in Berlin University, and took a prominent part in bestirring the patriotism of his countrymen till it found a vent in the war of liberation, 1812-13. Died, 1814.

Field, Cyrus W., an American merchant; was born in Stockbridge, Mass., in 1819. Was the original organizer of the Atlantic Telegraph Company, 1856-66, which succeeded after many reverses in establishing telegraphic communication between the United States and Europe. Died, 1892.

Field, Eugene, American poet and journalist; born at St. Louis, Mo., September 2, 1850. He moved to New England, but was educated later in Missouri. Field entered journalism at the age of twenty-three, ten years later becoming editor of the "Sharps and Flats" column of the Chicago Daily News. His humorous sayings therein during the following decade established his reputation in newspaper work. He was an author and poet of rare sympathy, his poems of childhood exhibiting rare qualities of appreciation and power of expression, and gaining for him the title, "The Child's Poet." Among his works are: "The Denver Tribune Primer," "Culture's Garden," "Love Affairs of a Bibliomaniac," "Little Book of Western Verse," "With Trumpet and Drum," etc. Mr. Field died November 4, 1895.

Field, David Dudley, born in 1805; American jurist, and brother of Cyrus Field and Stephen Field; was, in 1857, appointed to draw up a political, civil, and penal code, of which parts have been adopted by several of the States. To him is due the formation of an association for the reform of the law of nations, and for the adoption of arbitration in place of war. In 1889, the University of Edinburgh conferred upon him the degree of LL. D. Died, 1894.

Field, Marshall, merchant; born in Conway, Mass., in 1835; spent boyhood on farm; studied at academy until 1852; dry goods clerk, Pittsfield, Mass., 1852-56; in Chicago, 1856-60; junior partner, 1860-65, then senior partner in house, which became, 1865, Field, Palmer & Leiter. Potter Palmer retired, 1867, and Levi Z. Leiter, 1881, Mr. Field becoming head of Marshall Field & Company, now having the largest wholesale and retail dry goods business in the world. Founded, with gift of $1,000,000, the Field Columbian Museum of Chicago; gave money and land to the amount of $450,000 to University of Chicago. Twice married; second time in London, September 5, 1905, to Mrs. Delia Spencer Caton, of Chicago. Died in 1906, leaving an immense fortune.

Fielding, Henry, the father of English fiction, and one of the most illustrious prose-writers in the language; was born in Somersetshire, in 1707, of a noble family allied to the imperial house of Austria. After dissipating a handsome fortune in the pleasures of youth, Fielding launched into authorship, and in 1742 produced his "Joseph Andrews," a sparkling satire upon the characteristics of the Richardsonian school of fiction. In 1749, the novel of "Tom Jones" appeared like a comet in the literary world, to still remain without a rival in the language. "Amelia" followed, in 1751, to entrance the minds of such critics as Burke, Gibbon, and Dr. Johnson. Died in Lisbon, in 1754.

Fillmore, Millard, American statesman; born in Summerhill, N. Y., in 1800; was apprenticed to a wool carder, but became a clerk in a judge's office, and then found entrance to the bar. He entered Congress in 1832, was appointed chairman of the committee of ways and means in 1840, and was author of the tariff of 1842. He became controller of the State of New York in 1844, was elected vice-president of the United States in 1848, and succeeded to the presidency on the death of General Taylor in 1850. By signing the act for the surrender of fugitive slaves he brought about the utter defeat of the Whig party in 1853. In 1856 he was nominated for the presidency, but received only scanty support. Died, 1874.

Firdausi (fur-dou'se), or Firdusi, the most eminent of Persian poets, was born in Khorassan, about A. D. 940. During his lifetime his fame filled the East, and he was the recipient of great honors from the Sultan Mahmoud. His chief poem, the "Shah-Nameh," or "Book of Kings," has been termed by Sir William Jones "a glorious monument of Oriental genius and learning." Died about 1020.

Fisher, Harrison, illustrator; born in Brooklyn, July 27, 1875; educated in San Francisco; recent books illustrated by him: "The Market Place," by Harold Frederic; "Three Men on Wheels," by Jerome K. Jerome; "The Eagle's Heart," by Hamlin Garland; "Hiawatha," by Longfellow; now illustrating "The Saturday Evening Post," "McClure's Magazine," "Life," "Puck," "Ladies' Home Journal," "Scribner's," etc.

Fiske, Minnie Maddern, actress; born in New Orleans, in 1865; appeared in child's part when 3 years old; at 12 was alternately playing leading rôles and old women parts, and at 15 became a star, under name of Minnie Maddern. Retired, about 1890, for five years; married March 19, 1890, Harrison Grey Fiske, journalist and playwright, in whose "Hester Crewe" she returned to the stage; since then starring in various plays.

Author: "Biography of Matthew Watson Foster," "A Century of American Diplomacy," "American Diplomacy in the Orient," "Arbitration and The Hague Court."

Fox, Charles James, statesman; born in Westminster in 1749; was the third son of Henry Fox, Lord Holland, who early inducted him into gambling and the other fashionable vices, which clung to him through life. Educated at Eton and at Hertford College, Oxford, he entered parliament at the age of 19 as member for Midhurst, and, having immediately made his mark as a debater, became a lord of the admiralty, and was in 1773 nominated lord of the treasury. He soon, however, quarreled with Lord North. In 1782, Fox became secretary of state under Lord Rockingham, but on the latter's death (in the same year), refused to serve under Lord Shelburne. His name was struck off the list of privy councilors, and in 1797, he retired from parliamentary life to superintend the education of his nephew, Lord Holland, and to write the "History of the Reign of James II." When his great rival, Pitt, formed his last administration, he wished Fox to join it, but the king gave a steady refusal. On Pitt's death, in 1806, he was at last obliged to admit him to office, and Fox became foreign secretary in Grenville's ministry of "All the Talents." But the term of his life had nearly run out, and he had no time to realize the high expectations of his followers. His last motion in parliament was directed against the slave trade, and he died (at Chiswick in 1806) within a few months of the measure founded upon it being passed into law. He was admittedly the first orator of his time; he was also a man of wide reading, and he showed himself equal to sacrifices to principle such as few statesmen have cared to make.

Fox, George, founder of the Society of Friends; was born in County Leicester, England, in 1624. Early adopting the peculiar tenets and manners known as Quakerism, he suffered for many years continual persecution. In 1671, he sailed for the West Indies and the American Colonies, to propagate the doctrines of the sect he had originated; and on his return to England, in 1673, he was again imprisoned, but soon released through the influence of William Penn. After the accession of William III. to the throne, the public worship of the Society of Friends became tolerated and legalized. Died in London in 1691.

Francis Joseph Charles, Emperor of Austria and King of Hungary; born in 1830; is the son of the Emperor Francis I., and nephew of the Emperor Ferdinand I. The revolution of 1848 compelled Ferdinand to abdicate, and his brother resigning his claims to the throne in favor of his own son, the latter was at the early age of 18 called to rule an empire shaken by civil war. He took part in the campaign against the Hungarians, and was present at the capture of Raab in June, 1849. Restored to the mastery of his dominions, he proceeded to undo the work of 1848. The Hungarian constitution was suspended, the absolute authority of the Habsburg monarchy in the Austrian dominions proclaimed, and the imperial ministers were declared responsible only to the emperor. The absolute régime was maintained during the first ten years of his reign, though his own sentiments inclined to a more liberal rule. It was not till Austria had sustained severe reverses abroad that the system fell. The demand of Napoleon III. that the question of the Lombardo-Venetian states should be referred to a European conference being refused, war was declared. The Austrians were defeated at the battle of Solferino on June 24, 1859, and the emperor was compelled to sign the treaty of Villafranca, by which all claims to Lombardy were resigned. A partial return to constitutionalism was then attempted, and representative diets were restored in the different states, but the Hungarians did not cease to demand restoration of their old national institutions in their integrity. A dispute between Austria and Prussia as to Schleswig-Holstein led to war between the two nations in 1866. Here again the Austrians were completely defeated, and were compelled to accept the North German Confederation under the leadership of Prussia, and to give up Venice to Italy. After these disasters the emperor restored national self-government to Hungary, and in June, 1877, was declared king of that country. In later years the emperor's influence in foreign politics has been chiefly directed to forming a closer alliance with Germany and Italy. In 1878, the treaty of Berlin allowed Austria to occupy Bosnia and the Herzegovina. In 1887 the emperor took part in a series of military councils held to provide for the defense of Galicia against Russia. By the suicide of the Crown Prince Rudolph in February, 1889, he was deprived of all hope of a direct successor, and the crown will pass, on his death, to his nephew, Francis Ferdinand, son of his brother, Charles Louis.

Franklin, Benjamin, born in 1706; statesman, philosopher, and publisher; was the fifteenth of seventeen children of a soap-boiler of Boston, Mass. Quarreling with his brother, he went to Philadelphia almost penniless. Here, in 1729, he purchased the "Pennsylvania Gazette," formed a club called "The Junto," and began to acquire political influence. He was chosen clerk of the provincial assembly in 1736, and in 1753, became postmaster-general for British North America. In 1754, when a rupture with France was expected, he sat as a delegate in the Congress at Albany, and in 1756, for a third time held a military command. In 1757, he was sent to England as agent for Pennsylvania, and his reputation as a practical philosopher having preceded him, he was received with great respect, Edinburgh, Oxford, and St. Andrews conferring upon him the degree of doctor of laws. In 1764 he revisited England as colonial agent, and was mainly instrumental in securing the repeal of the stamp act. When the rupture with England took place he was elected a member of the American Congress, signed the Declaration of Independence, and subsequently aided in framing the Constitution of the United States. In 1776 he was appointed ambassador to France, and held the post until 1785. He returned to America to assume the office of president of Pennsylvania, to which he was twice re-elected, retiring from public life in 1788. Among his scientific discoveries was the identity of lightning with electricity, which he demonstrated by his famous kite experiment. He also discovered the course taken by storms over the North American continent. Died, 1790.

Frederick II., usually called "the Great," was born in A. D. 1712; King of Prussia from 1740 to 1786. During his reign the power of Prussia was greatly extended. The Seven Years' War (1756-63), in which he took part with England, secured to him a decided influence in the affairs of Europe, and added Silesia to his dominions; in 1772, he shared in the partition of Poland, and obtained as his portion all Polish Prussia and a part of Great Poland; and, in 1779, by the Treaty of Teschen, he obtained Franconia. Thus, at his death, his kingdom was one-half larger in area than it had been at his accession; his army was as well organized as any in Europe; and the internal affairs of the country were directed by him with vigor, and, on the whole, with prudence. He was in many respects one of the greatest figures in modern history. The "History of Friedrich II. of Prussia, commonly called Frederick the Great," by Thomas Carlyle, brings out clearly and forcibly the good and the bad sides of his character. Died, 1786.

Frederick Charles, Prince of Prussia, born in 1828; known as the "Red Prince" from the color of his favorite hussar uniform, was the eldest son of Prince Charles, brother of the German Emperor William, his mother being a sister of the Empress Augusta. He served in the first Schleswig-Holstein War, and having become a general of cavalry, with command of the third army corps, he commanded the right wing of the Prussian army during the Danish War of 1864. In the Austrian War of 1866, he commanded the first army, and to him the crowning victory of Sadowa was mainly due. In the Franco-German War he commanded the second army, which he led to victories at Thionville, Gravelotte, and St. Privat, and thus blockaded Bazaine in the entrenchments of Metz. After Bazaine's surrender with 170,000 men, the prince hastened westward to check the armies of Chanzy and D'Aurelles de Paladine in their attempts to relieve Paris from the south. A series of battles lasted almost uninterruptedly from the middle of November till the middle of January, when the French army of the west was rendered impotent at Le Mans. In the previous October, he had been created field-marshal. Prince Frederick was father of the Duchess of Connaught. Died, 1885.

Freeman, Edward Augustus, born in 1823; an eminent historian, educated at Trinity College, Oxford. His first work was a "History of Architecture" (1849). After several minor works, his most important one on the "History of the Norman Conquest" appeared between 1867 and 1876, and was followed by that of "The Reign of William Rufus and Accession of Henry I." He also wrote histories of the "Saracens" and of the "Ottoman Power in Europe," and various other works, some of a more popular character, besides many articles and reviews. In 1884, he was appointed Regius professor of Modern History at Oxford. Died, 1892.

French, Daniel Chester, sculptor; born in Exeter, N. H., April 20, 1850; educated in Exeter, N. H.; Massachusetts Institution of Technology, Boston, one year; A. M., Dartmouth College; studied in Boston and in Florence, Italy; had studio in Washington, 1876-78; in Boston and Concord, Mass., 1878-87; and in New York, 1887-1900. Among his best known works are "The Minute Man of Concord," at Concord, Mass.; a statue of General Cass, in the capitol at Washington; statue of Rufus Choate, Boston courthouse; John Harvard, at Cambridge, Mass., and Thomas Starr King statues; "Dr. Gallaudet and His First Deaf-Mute Pupil," the Milmore Memorial; and colossal "Statue of the Republic," at World's Columbian Exposition. Received medal of honor, Paris Exposition, 1900.

Frick, Henry Clay, manufacturer; born in West Overton, Pa., December 19, 1849; began business life as a clerk for his grandfather, a flour merchant and distiller; later embarked in small way in coke business. Was president, and since 1897 chairman, of board of directors of H. C. Frick Coke Company, now largest coke producer in the world, operating nearly 40,000 acres of coal and 12,000 coke ovens, with daily capacity of 25,000 tons. Came into public notice by his vigorous management during the famous strike at Homestead, 1892, when he was several times shot and stabbed by one of the strikers. Chairman of board of the firm of Carnegie Bros., 1889-92, and chairman of board of managers of the Carnegie Steel Company since 1892; is also director or officer in numerous other business enterprises.

Froebel, Friedrich (frö'bēl), the founder of the famous Kindergarten system, was a devoted German educationist on the principles of Pestalozzi, which combined physical, moral, and intellectual training, commencing with the years of childhood. Born, 1782; died, 1852.

Froude, James Anthony (frood), an English essayist and historian, was born in Devonshire, in 1818, and educated at Oxford. In 1849, appeared from his pen that remarkable book, "The Nemesis of Faith." His reputation, however, chiefly rests on his "History of England from the Fall of Wolsey to the Death of Elizabeth." Died, 1894.

Frye, William Pierce, lawyer, United States senator from Maine since 1881; born in Lewiston, Me., September 2, 1831; graduate of Bowdoin College, 1850 (LL.D., 1889; also LL.D., Bates, 1881); studied and practiced law. Member of Maine Legislature, 1861, 1862, and 1867; mayor of Lewiston, 1866-67; attorney-general of Maine, 1867-69; presidential elector, 1864; member of Congress, 1871-81. Chairman of Commerce Commission of Senate; member of Peace Commission, Paris, 1898; president pro tem. of the Senate, 1896-1901, after the death of Vice-President Hobart; discharged the duties of that office during the 56th Congress; and was also president pro tem. during Mr. Roosevelt's administration.

Fuller, Melville Weston, Chief Justice of the United States, was born in Augusta, Me., February 11, 1833. He was graduated from Bowdoin College in 1853, and attended a course of lectures at Harvard Law School. He was admitted to the bar, 1855; formed a law partnership at Augusta; was associate editor of "The Age," a Democratic paper there, president of the common council, and city solicitor. Went to Chicago in 1856, and practiced law until 1888. Was member of the Illinois State Constitutional Convention, 1862, and of the legislature, 1863-65. He became Chief Justice of the United States, October 8, 1888.

Fulton, Robert, an American engineer, was born in Pennsylvania in 1765; began life as a miniature portrait and landscape painter, in which he made some progress, but soon turned to engineering. He was one of the first to apply steam to the propulsion of vessels, and devoted much attention to the invention of submarine boats and torpedoes; he built a steamboat to navigate the Hudson River, with a very slow rate of progress, however, making only five miles an hour. Died, 1815.

Funston, Fred, brigadier-general of United States Army; born in Ohio, November 9, 1865; graduate of Iola, Kan., high school, 1886; studied in Kansas State University, Lawrence, two years, but was not graduated; reporter, Kansas City, 1890; botanist in United States Death Valley expedition, 1891; commissioner for Department of Agriculture to explore Alaska and report on its flora, 1893, camping on the Klondike in winter of 1893-94; floated down Yukon, alone, in a canoe; joined insurgent army in Cuba, 1896; served eighteen months; was wounded; returned to United States; commissioned colonel of 20th Kansas Volunteers, 1898; went to Philippines; took part in several battles; for crossing Rio Grande River at Calumpit on small bamboo raft in face of heavy fire and establishing rope ferry, by means of which the United States troops were enabled to cross and win the battle, he was promoted to brigadier-general of United States Volunteers, May 2, 1899. Continued in active service in Philippines. Organized and commanded expedition resulting in capture of Aguinaldo, head of Filipino insurrection, and was appointed brigadier-general of United States Army, March 30, 1901; commanding department of California, with headquarters at San Francisco, 1905.

Gainsborough, Thomas (gānz'bro), an English painter, born in Sudbury in 1727, was the first great landscapist of the English school. His works, highly prized by collectors, excel in richness of coloring and vigor of chiaroscuro. Died, 1788.

Galen, or Gale' nus, Claudius, born in Pergamus, in Mysia, about A. D. 130; a very celebrated physician, who practiced first in his native city, and afterwards in Rome, where he attended the emperors Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus. He was the author of a large number of medical and philosophical writings, of which upwards of eighty are still extant. Died about 200.

Galilei, Galileo, astronomer and natural philosopher; born in Pisa in 1564; was educated first in Florence, but afterwards returned to Pisa to study medicine, for which profession his father designed him. Here, after becoming known as an opponent of the Aristotelian maxims, he discovered, in 1582, the law of the vibrations of the pendulum. Soon afterward he began to study mathematics, and was appointed professor at Pisa when only 25. Thence he removed to Padua in 1593, and during his residence there invented a thermometer and constructed his first telescope, the invention of which he had heard of at Venice. He also made astronomical discoveries, and was reestablished in 1610, at Pisa, by his patron, Cosimo de' Medici. Here it was that his opposition to traditional views, and especially his advocacy of the Copernican doctrine that the sun was the center of the universe, brought him into conflict with the Inquisition, but proceedings were dropped on Galileo's promise not to teach the obnoxious doctrine. On the publication, however, in 1632, seventeen years after, of his "Dialogue" on the same subject, he was again summoned to Rome, condemned to imprisonment for life, and required to solemnly recant his opinion. He was confined at first in the house of one of the Inquisitors, his pupil, but was afterwards allowed to live in Florence, where he died, having been blind four years. His works were published in Florence in the years 1843-46. Died, 1642.

Gallaudet, Thomas Hopkins (gāl-law-dēt'), an American philanthropist, was born in Pennsylvania in 1787, and died in 1851. He founded the first deaf and dumb asylum in the United States, at Hartford, Conn.

Gallinger, Jacob H., M. D., United States senator from New Hampshire, 1891-1909; born in Cornwall, Ont., March 28, 1837; academic education; graduate in medicine, 1858 (hon. A. M., Dartmouth); practiced medicine until he entered public life. Member of New Hampshire Legislature, 1872-73, 1891; State constitutional convention, 1876; State senator, 1878, 1879, 1880; president of State Senate, 1879, 1880. Surgeon-general of State, with rank of brigadier-general, 1879-80. chairman of Republican State Committee, 1882-90, 1898-1905; member of Congress, 1885-89.

Galvani, Luigi, born in Bologna, September 9, 1737; a celebrated Italian physiologist, from whom "Galvanism" derived its name. He was educated for the profession of medicine, and, in 1762, was appointed lecturer on anatomy in the University of Bologna, in which city he practiced. It was while holding this lectureship that he made those discoveries, partly by means of experiments on the muscles of frogs, which he published to the world, in 1791, in his treatise entitled, "De Viribus Electricitatis in Motu Musculari Commentarius." The now fully-established doctrine of animal electricity owes its origin to the patient and laborious investigations (at first little thought of) of the Bologna professor. Died, December 4, 1798.

Gambetta, Leon Michel, born in 1838; French statesman; son of a grocer of Cahors; went as a young man to Paris with the object of practicing at the bar, but did nothing remarkable till his thirtieth year. In 1868, he attracted notice by his conduct of the defense in the "procès Delescluze," and in the next year was elected deputy for both Paris and Marseilles, when he immediately became the most influential member of the Opposition. After the outbreak of the war, in the midst of the siege of Paris, he went to Tours in a balloon, and was chiefly instrumental in organizing the government and the conduct of the war. During the years between the treaty of peace that followed and 1879, Gambetta was chiefly occupied with the progressive development of Opportunism. In the latter year it was his influence which, in the main, brought about the abdication of Marshal Macmahon. On the election of M. Grévy, he became president of the chamber, and, in 1881, prime minister of France, but only held office a few months, resigning on January 27, 1882, after which he took very little part in affairs. He died on December 31st of the same year, from a wound accidentally inflicted on himself by a pistol shot.

Gardiner, Samuel Rawson, born in 1829; English historian; was educated at Winchester and Christ Church. In 1884, he was elected fellow of All Souls', and was for some years professor of modern history at King's College, London. His historical works include "The History of England from the Accession of James I. to the Disgrace of Chief Justice Coke," "Prince Charles and the Spanish Marriage," "England Under the Duke of Buckingham and Charles I.," "The Personal Government of Charles I.," and the "Fall of the Monarchy of Charles I.," all these being republished as a continuous work in 1883-84; "An Introduction to the Study of English History" (with J. B. Mullinger), "History of the Great Civil War," and a complete "History of England." Died, 1902.

Garfield, James Abram, born in Orange Township, Cuyahoga County, Ohio, November 19, 1831; the twentieth president of the United States. He was elected to the presidency at the close of 1880, and entered upon office in the spring of the following year; but on the 2d of July, he was shot by an assassin (Guiteau) while at the Washington station of the Baltimore & Potomac Railway, and died at Long Branch, on the Atlantic coast, after lingering for nearly three months. His early poverty, his manly independence, his hard-won attainments, and his incorruptible integrity, had all caused his career to be watched as that of a man of exceptional powers and of brilliant promise; and his untimely death was mourned, not only by his own countrymen, but by the whole civilized world. Died, September 19, 1881.

Garfield, James Rudolph, ex-secretary of the Interior; son of James Abram Garfield, twentieth president of the United States, was born in Hiram, Ohio, October 17, 1865; graduate of Williams College, Massachusetts, 1885; studied at Columbia Law School; admitted to the bar in 1888; practiced law in Ohio, 1888-1902; member of Ohio Senate, 1896 to 1900; trustee of Williams College; member of United States Civil Service Commission from 1902 to February, 1903; commissioner of corporations, Department of Commerce and Labor, from February, 1903, to March, 1907. Appointed secretary of the interior, March 5, 1907.

Garibaldi (gär-e-bäl'dē), an Italian patriot, began life as a sailor. He associated himself enthusiastically with Mazzini for the liberation of his country, but being convicted of conspiracy, fled to South America, where, both as a privateer and a soldier, he gave his services to the young republics struggling there for life. Returning to Europe, he took part in the defense of Rome against France, but being defeated, fled to New York, to return to the Isle of Caprera, biding his time. He joined the Piedmontese against Austria, and, in 1860, set himself to assist in the overthrow of the Kingdom of Naples and the union of Italy under Victor Eminent. Landing in Calabria, he entered Naples, and drove the royal forces before him without striking a blow, after which he returned to his retreat at Caprera, ready still to draw sword, and occasionally offering it again in the cause of republicanism. Born in 1807; died in 1882.

Garrick, David, English actor, son of a captain in the army; was born in Hereford in 1717; and went to London with Dr. Johnson in 1736, to study law. On the death of his father, however, he joined his brother, a wine merchant, but soon gave this up to go on the stage. He made his first appearance, under the name of Lyddal, at Ipswich, in 1741, and soon after played "Richard" in the theater of Goodman's Fields, where his success enabled him to get an engagement at Drury Lane. In 1743, he went to Dublin; in 1747, became joint patentee of Drury Lane, two years later marrying Mademoiselle Violette. He acted at Drury Lane until 1776, when he retired and sold his share in the concern. His last appearance was on June 10th, as Don Felix in "The Wonder." He died on January 20, 1779, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Garrison, William Lloyd, born in 1805; American abolitionist, of humble birth; was apprenticed at the age of 13 to the printer of the "Newburyport (Mass.) Herald," for which paper he afterwards wrote. In 1826, he became owner and editor of the "Free Press," and in the next year, editor of the "National Philanthropist," in which temperance and emancipation were advocated. In 1831, he started "The Liberator," and from henceforth devoted himself entirely, at great personal risk, to the cause of slavery abolition. He visited England three times—in 1833, 1840, and 1866—and was well received. In 1847, "Sonnets and Other Poems" from his pen were published, and, in 1852, a selection from his speeches and writings. Died, 1879.

Gaskell, Mary, born in 1822; English novelist (née Stevenson), married a Unitarian minister, and wrote "Mary Barton" (1848), "Moorland Cottage" (1850), and several contributions to "Household Words," which included "Cranford" and "North and South"; "Wives and Daughters" was appearing in the "Cornhill" at the time of her death. She also wrote a biography of Charlotte Brontë. She was a friend and helper of Thomas Wright, and was very active in charitable works during the cotton famine. Died, 1865.

Gates, Horatio, American general; born in England in 1728, and accompanied General Braddock, but subsequently purchased an estate in Virginia, where he lived until the outbreak of the war in 1775, when he was appointed by Congress adjutant-general. He performed many services to the American cause, the greatest of which was the defeat of Burgoyne at Saratoga. In the latter part of the war he held a command in the South, and was not so successful, being defeated by Lord Cornwallis at Camden. Died, 1806.

Gatling, Richard Jordan, born in 1818; American inventor; a doctor by profession. In 1850, he invented a double-acting hemp-brake, and, in 1857, a steam plough; but his most celebrated invention was that of the revolving gun, which bears his name, the conception of which came to him in 1861. In 1865, the gun was improved and tested, and was forthwith brought into use by the United States service; and several European governments also adopted it. Among Dr. Gatling's later inventions were an improved method of casting steel cannon and a pneumatic gun for discharging explosives. Died, 1903.

Gauss, Karl Friedrich, born in 1777; German mathematician and astronomer, patronized by the Duke of Brunswick, who defrayed the expenses of his education at Brunswick and Göttingen, where in 1801 he produced "Disquisitiones Arithmeticae." In 1807, he became professor and director of the observatory at Göttingen, and held the position until his death. During this period he brought out many works on pure mathematics, astronomy, and other sciences, among which the chief are "Theoria Motus Corporum Caelestium, in Sectionibus conicis Ambientium," "Recherches sur la Géodésie supérieure," and invented the Heliotrope. Died in 1855.

Gengis Khan, born in 1162; Emperor of the Mongols, whose real name was Temoutchin, the title meaning "the chief of the most powerful." Having consolidated the Tartar tribes, he marched against the Emperor of China, whose general he was, overran his empire (1212-1214), ravaged northern India, which he temporarily subdued, and penetrated into Russia through Persia. Having reached the Crimea, sacked numerous towns, and slaughtered millions of men, the Tartars returned. Died, 1227.

Genseric, born in 406; King of the Vandals, reigned at first with his brother Gonderic, afterwards alone, and greatly strengthened the Vandal power in Spain. In 429 he invaded northern Africa, stamped out Christianity, and from his new capital, Carthage, made incursions on the inhabitants of Italy and Sicily. In 455, being invited to Rome by the widow of Valentinian to take part against his murderer Maximus, he caused the city to be sacked for fourteen days, and carried away among his prisoners the Empress Fudocia and her sons, besides much treasure. Genseric professed to be an Arian Christian. Died, 477.

George is the name given to four (Hanoverian) kings of England. George I. (Lewis), son of Ernest Augustus, Elector of Hanover, by Sophia, granddaughter of James I., was born at Osnaburg, 1660, and died in 1727. He succeeded his father, 1698, and on the death of Queen Anne was declared her successor under the act of settlement which excluded the Roman Catholic descendants of James II. George was entirely ignorant of the English language, and was only tolerated by the English people. George II. (Augustus), son and successor of the former, was born at Hanover, 1683; crowned in 1727, and died in 1760. George distinguished himself in the general European War of 1740, in which he was the ally of Austria against France, Spain, and Prussia, and commanded in person in the victory over the French at Dettingen, 1743. In 1755, war was renewed, and George allied himself with Frederick the Great of Prussia against France in the Seven Years' War. George III., grandson of the former, and son of Frederick, Prince of Wales, was born in 1738, and died in 1820, after the longest reign of any English monarch. During his reign the American colonies secured their independence. George IV., son and successor of the former, was born in 1762, and died in 1830. He was an unpopular monarch, and was succeeded by his brother, William IV.

George, Henry, journalist, author; born in Sacramento, Cal., November 3, 1862; son of Henry G. (political economist); educated at public schools; in printing office at 16; in newspaper work since 1881; accompanied his father, 1883, on lecturing tour in Great Britain, as secretary; on his father's sudden death during mayoralty campaign, 1897, was nominated to succeed his father as candidate of Jeffersonian party for mayor of Greater New York, but received small vote. Author: "Life of Henry George," 1900. Address: 180 St. Nicholas Avenue, New York.

George, Henry, American land reformer; was born in Philadelphia, in 1839, and, after being successively in a counting-house and a printer's office and at sea, settled in California, and in 1866 joined the staff of a San Francisco paper. He afterwards became editor of two papers there, and made his first essay on the land question in "Our Land and Land Policy," published in 1871. In 1876 he was state inspector of gas-meters, but in 1880 removed to New York, and the next year visited Ireland on his way to England. He was there arrested as a "suspect" under Mr. Forster's act, but was soon released. "Progress and Poverty" had been written in 1879, and its author undertook lecturing tours in 1883 and 1889 in support of his principles. Beside this book he published "The Irish Land Question," "Social Problems," and "Protection and Free Trade." In 1886 he was a candidate for the mayoralty of New York. Died in 1897.

Gibbon, Edward, English historian; born in Putney, in 1737, and educated at Westminster and Magdalen College, Oxford. While at the university he was received into the Romish Church, but having been sent to a Calvinist at Lausanne became a Protestant again the next year. At Lausanne he met Voltaire, and fell in love with Mademoiselle Curchod, afterwards Madame Necker. He returned to London in 1758, and after a short term of service in the Hampshire militia, revisited the Continent, staying especially at Paris and Rome. When again in England he wrote "Mémoires Littéraires de la Grand Bretagne," and set to work on his great book, "The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," the first volume of which appeared in 1776 and the last in 1788. He entered parliament in 1774, as a supporter of Lord North, wrote the "Mémoire Justificatif," and obtained a place at the board of trade. From 1783 to 1793, he lived at Lausanne, and died (1794), soon after his return.

Gibbons, James, Roman Catholic cardinal; born in Baltimore, July 23, 1834; at early age taken by parents to their former home in Ireland; began his education there; returned to United States, and resided in New Orleans with his family, 1848; entered St. Charles College, Maryland, 1855; transferred, 1857, to St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore; ordained priest, June 30, 1861; assistant St. Patrick's, Baltimore, for a few months; then pastor of St. Bridget's, Canton (suburb of Baltimore); later private secretary to Archbishop Spalding and chancellor of the arch-diocese; assistant chancellor, second plenary council of American Roman Catholic Church, Baltimore, October, 1866; vicar apostolic of North Carolina, with rank and title of bishop, 1868; coadjutor archbishop of Baltimore, May 20, 1877; succeeded to the see, October 3, 1877; presided at third national council at Baltimore, November, 1884; was nominated as cardinal; invested with the princely insignia, June 30, 1886. Author: "The Faith of Our Fathers," "Our Christian Heritage," "The Ambassador of Christ."

Gibson, Charles Dana, illustrator; born in Roxbury, Mass., September 14, 1867; educated at Flushing, L. I., also Art Students' League, New York, 1884-85; has done much illustrating in principal magazines; also illustrated numerous books. Author: "Sketches in London," "People of Dickens," "Drawings," "Pictures of People," "Sketches and Cartoons," "The Education of Mr. Pipp," "Sketches in Egypt," "The Americans," "A Widow and Her Friends," "The Social Ladder."

Gildersleeve, Basil Lanneau, professor of Greek in Johns Hopkins since 1876; born in Charleston, S. C., October 23, 1831; graduated at Princeton, 1849, A. M., 1852; studied at universities of Berlin, Bonn and Göttingen (Ph. D., 1853; LL. D., 1869, William and Mary, Harvard, 1896, Yale, 1901, University of Chicago, 1901; D. C. L., University of the South, 1884; L. H. D., Princeton, 1899); professor of Greek, 1856-76, and of Latin, 1861-66, University of Virginia. Dana, geologist," "Science and Letters in Yale," editor-in-chief, "New International Encyclopædia." Died, 1908.

Giotto, Ambrogio Bondone, born in 1276; Italian painter and architect; pupil of Cimabue and friend of Dante, whose portrait he painted at Ravenna; was son of a citizen of Florence, and apprenticed to a woolstapler; painted frescoes at Assisi, and was probably the founder of the modern school of portrait-painting. About 1299 he went to Rome, where he painted and worked in mosaics; and subsequently was employed at Padua and Florence, where his frescoes in the Peruzzi chapel of Santa Croce were discovered in 1863. He also painted the "Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes," at Naples, and designed the campanile of Florence. He died in 1336, and was buried in the cathedral there.

Girard, Stephen (zhe-rahrd'), an American philanthropist, born near Bordeaux, France, in 1750; rose from a humble sphere of life to become a trader in Philadelphia, in 1776, in which city he eventually became a merchant and banker, and amassed a large fortune. Dying in 1831, he bequeathed $2,000,000 to the erection of a college for orphan boys, conducted on rigidly secular principles. This building, the finest in the Grecian style in the United States, was commenced in 1833, and completed in 1848.

Gladden, Washington, author, Congregational clergyman; born in Pottsgrove, Pa., February 11, 1836; graduate of Williams, 1859 (D. D., Roanoke College, Va., LL. D., University of Wisconsin and Notre Dame University, Ind.); held several pastorates and editorial positions prior to becoming (1882) pastor of First Congregational Church, Columbus, O.; especially known as writer upon social reforms. Author: "Plain Thoughts on the Art of Living," "From the Hub to the Hudson," "Workingmen and Their Employers," "Being a Christian," "The Christian Way," "The Lord's Prayer," "The Christian League of Connecticut," "Things New and Old," "The Young Men and the Churches," "Applied Christianity," "Parish Problems," "Burning Questions," "Santa Claus on a Lark," "Who Wrote the Bible," "Tools and the Man," "The Cosmopolis City Club," "The Church and the Kingdom," "Seven Puzzling Bible Books," "Social Facts and Forces," "Art and Morality," "The Christian Pastor," "How Much is Left of the Old Doctrines," "Straight Shots at Young Men," "Social Salvation," "The Practice of Immortality," "Where Does the Sky Begin?" "Christianity and Socialism."

Gladstone, William Ewart (gläd'stun), statesman, orator, and scholar; born in Liverpool in 1809, son of a Liverpool merchant, sometime of Leith, and of Ann, daughter of Andrew Robertson, Stornoway; was educated at Eton and Oxford, and entered parliament in 1832, as member for Newark in the Tory interest. Gladstone delivered his maiden speech on slavery emancipation, May 17, 1833; accepted office under Sir Robert Peel in 1834, and again in 1841 and 1846; and as member for Oxford, separating from the Tory party, took office under Lord Aberdeen, and, in 1859, under Lord Palmerston, became chancellor of the exchequer; elected member for South Lancashire in 1865, he became leader of the Commons under Lord John Russell; elected for Greenwich, he became premier for the first time in 1869, holding office until 1875; after a brilliant campaign in Midlothian, he was returned for that county in 1880, and became premier for the second time; became premier a third time in 1886, and a fourth time in 1892. During his tenure of office, he introduced and carried a great number of important measures, but failed from desertion in the Liberal ranks to carry his pet measure of home rule for Ireland, so he retired from office into private life in 1895, and spent his last days chiefly in literary work, the fruit of which, added to earlier works, gives evidence of the breadth of his sympathies and the extent of his scholarly attainments; but, being seized by a fatal malady, his strong constitution gradually sank under it, and he died at Hawarden, May 19, 1898, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Glasgow, Ellen Anderson Gholson, novelist; born in Richmond, Va., April 22, 1874; private education. Author: "The Descendant," "Phases of an Inferior Planet," "The Voice of the People," "The Freeman and Other Poems," "The Battle Ground," "The Deliverance."

Godfrey de Bouillon, crusader, King of Jerusalem; set out in 1096; took Nicæa and Antioch in 1097; defeated the Saracens next year, and, in 1099, after a month's siege, took Jerusalem and slaughtered the inhabitants. In the same year he was elected king, but refused to assume the title, and won the battle of Ascalon, dying, probably by poison, in 1100.

Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von, German poet, philosopher, and romance writer; was born in Frankfurt-on-the-Main in 1749, of noble family, and received a liberal education. At sixteen, he went to Leipzig to study law, to which, however, he did not confine himself. After about two years' study of alchemy and mystical writers, he went to Strasburg in 1769, where he came under the influence of Herder and met Wagner. On his return to Frankfurt, two years later, he published "Goetz von Berlichingen" and "Lieder der Werther," the latter of which was immensely popular. In 1775, he went to Weimar, where the grand duke gave him the office of chamberlain; and, in 1786, to Italy, where he traveled for two years, and conceived some of his greatest works. The dramas of "Iphigenia," "Egmont," and "Torquato Tasso" were produced between 1786 and 1790, in which year also the first fragments of "Faust" were published. In 1794, Goethe's botanical researches brought him into connection with Schiller, and in the same year he produced "Wilhelm Meister." The results of his scientific studies were, besides "The Metamorphosis of Plants," the "Beiträge zur Optik" (1791-92), and a book on the theory of color, "Farbenlehre," published in 1810, in opposition to Newton's theories. Meanwhile "Hermann und Dorothea" had appeared in 1797, and the greater part of "Faust" in 1807, the latter not being finished till the year before his death. Next year he accompanied the Grand Duke of Weimar to Erfurt, and had an interview with Napoleon. During his last years he was occupied with his autobiography. Died, 1832.

Goldsmith, Oliver, born in 1728; English poet and romance writer; son of a poor Irish clergyman of Pallas, Longford, went as sizar, in 1744, to Trinity College, Dublin, where he led a miserable life till he took his degree five years later. After this—having failed to obtain ordination, took pupils for a time, and lost his money by extravagance—he went to Edinburgh in 1752, and from thence to Leyden; but, after staying there a year, found himself penniless, and traveled to London through France, Switzerland, and Northern Italy, supporting himself by flute-playing. After a precarious existence as a surgeon, an author, and a literary hack, he produced, in 1759, his "Inquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe." This sold well, and gained for the author the acquaintance of Dr. Johnson. Soon after he was engaged to contribute to the "Public Ledger," and the "Citizen of the World," and among other contributions wrote the "Letters from a Nobleman to His Son," "The Traveler" followed in 1765, and "The Vicar of Wakefield" (sold for fifty guineas only) in 1766, but Goldsmith was improvident as ever. As a dramatist he became known as the writer of the "Good-Natured Man," brought out at Covent Garden in 1768, and "She Stoops to Conquer" in 1773, and as a poet by "The Deserted Village" (1770), and his last work, "The Retaliation." He wrote numerous other works, among which may be mentioned "Animated Nature." Died, 1774.

Gordon, Major-General George Charles, born in Woolwich, January 23, 1833; a distinguished military commander and administrator, who was killed while defending Khartoum against the forces of the Mahdi during the expedition to the Soudan in 1884-85. He had already distinguished himself in the course of the Crimean War, and, subsequently, in China and in India. From 1865 to 1871, he lived quietly at Gravesend, devoting himself chiefly to works of philanthropy; but in the latter year he was appointed British representative on the European Commission of the Danube, and, two years later, governor of the equatorial provinces of Egypt. He held this position, with marvelous success, till the close of 1874, when he returned to England; but, in 1877, upon the khedive's earnest solicitation, he went out once more to the Soudan, afterwards serving his own government for a time in India and in South Africa. In January, 1884, he accepted from the king of the Belgians the command of the anti-slavery expedition which was about to be dispatched to the region of the Congo; but, before he could set out, he was offered by the English Government, and accepted, a commission to go again to the Soudan, on the enterprise which ultimately cost him his life. Died, January 26, 1885.

Gorky, Maxim, a Russian Zola, whose works have great force, whose spirit is embittered by his hard life as a worker on the Volga and in Russian bakehouses, and by his imprisonment as a political offender in 1905. Grant, Ulysses Simpson, born in 1822; American general and statesman; entered the army in 1843, and served with distinction in the Texas campaign of 1845. In 1848, he married, and in 1854, resigned his commission. During the Civil War he captured Fort Henry (February, 1862), and Fort Donelson; won the battle of Shiloh (April 6-7); defeated Price at Iuka (September 19th), and for his capture of Vicksburg in July, 1863, was made major-general. He further distinguished himself by the relief of Chattanooga in November, and was voted a gold medal for his services. In March, 1864, he became lieutenant-general and commander-in-chief of the Federal Armies, and in little more than a year brought the war to a close. On July 25, 1866, he was named general of the armies of the United States, and in 1868, became president, being re-elected in 1872. He successively superintended the pacification of the Southern States, the restoration of the finances, and the disbanding of the army, and he obtained from England the payment of the Alabama claims. On his retirement from office he made a tour round the world. Having lost his moderate fortune in an unfortunate speculation, he wrote an account of his life, which, being successful, to some extent relieved him. He died, in 1885, of cancer, after a year's severe suffering.

Grattan, Henry, born in 1746; Irish patriot, educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and called to the Irish bar in 1772; entered the Irish Parliament in 1775, and became an Opposition leader. In 1780 he moved that the crown was the only link between England and Ireland, and in 1782, by means of the volunteer movement, succeeded in obtaining legislative independence for his country. His views on Catholic emancipation were not shared by the whole of his party, and, after the recall of Fitzwilliam, power passed from his hands to the United Irishmen. Having been some years in retirement, he actively opposed the union, and after an interval of two years entered the British Parliament as member for Malton. He was offered office by Fox, but refused; supported the Irish insurrection bill of 1807, and devoted his last years to the cause of the Catholic emancipation. Died, 1820.

Gray, Asa, a distinguished American botanist; born in Paris, Oneida County, N. Y., in 1810; graduated in medicine in 1842; became Fisher professor of natural history at Harvard, and in 1874, succeeded Agassiz as regent of the Smithsonian Institution. His writings did much to promote the study of botany in America on a sound scientific basis, and also to forward the theories of Darwin. In conjunction with Doctor Torrey, he wrote "The Flora of North America," and by himself various manuals of botany and "Natural Science and Religion." Died, 1888.

Gray, George, jurist; born in New Castle, Del., May 4, 1840; graduated at Princeton, 1859 (A. M., 1863; LL. D., 1889); studied law at Harvard; admitted to bar, 1863; practiced at New Castle, 1863-69; afterward at Wilmington; attorney-general of Delaware, 1879-85; United States senator, 1885-99; Democrat; member foreign relations and judiciary committees in senate; in 1896 affiliated with the national (gold-standard) Democrats in the presidential election; member Peace Commission, Paris, 1898; appointed by the president member of the Joint High Commission at Quebec, 1898, and member of the International Permanent Court of Arbitration under The Hague convention, November, 1900; judge United States Circuit Court, third judicial circuit, since 1899; chairman Anthracite Coal Strike Commission, 1902.

Gray, Thomas, an English poet, was born in London, 1716, and educated at Cambridge, in which university he became professor of modern literature in 1769. His "Odes" occupy a high rank in English poetry, and his well-known "Elegy written in a Country Churchyard" (1749), is one of the most perfect compositions of its kind in the language. Died, 1771.

Greeley, Horace, born in 1811; American journalist and politician; son of a New Hampshire farmer; came to New York, and, after some failures, established in 1841, the "New York Tribune," in which he supported Lincoln and the Union. In 1848, he became a member of Congress, and, though not prominent there, was one of the founders of the Republican party in 1855. He ultimately, however, became a Democrat, and unsuccessfully opposed Grant for the presidency in 1872, but died (1872) the same year. He twice visited Europe. He was author of "The American Conflict," "What I Know about Farming," and "Recollections of a Busy Life."

Green, John Richard, English historian; born in Oxford in 1837, and educated at Magdalen College school and Jesus College; took orders in 1860, and was some time vicar of St. Philip's, Stepney, becoming in 1868, librarian at Lambeth. He was author of "A Short History of the English People," "A History of the English People," "The Making of England," and "The Conquest of England," published after his death, in 1883, by his wife, who assisted him in various other works, and herself wrote "Henry II." in the "Twelve English Statesmen" series. Died, 1883.

Greene, Nathaniel, born in 1742; American general; educated himself, and broke with the Quakers on account of his later military pursuits; distinguished himself at the battle of the Brandywine; was defeated several times by Cornwallis, but won the battle of Eutaw Springs. Died, 1786.

Gregory I., Pope, called the "Great"; was appointed by the Emperor of the East Governor of Rome, but, on inheriting his father's wealth, resigned it, and became Abbot of St. Andrew's, Rome. After being secretary to Pelagius II., he succeeded him as Bishop of Rome; renounced communion with the Eastern Christians because of the assumption of the title "Universal Bishop" by the patriarch of Constantinople; composed chants, and established a musical school, in which he taught himself, and collected and arranged fragments of ancient hymns. He was a great opponent of secular learning, but was author of numerous sacred works, of which the chief was his "Morals on the Book of Job." Died, 604.

Gregory VII., "Hildebrand"; born in 1020; a man of modest birth, who became monk of Clugny and Archdeacon of Rome; exercised great influence over Leo IX. and succeeding popes, till he was himself appointed, in 1073, to succeed Alexander II. He attacked simony and concubinage in the Church, and carried the power of the papacy to a high pitch, declining to submit to ratification of election from the emperor, and attempting to enforce spiritual control over the sovereigns of Europe. He was firmly opposed by William I. of England and Philip I. of France, but he excommunicated Henry IV. of Germany, and compelled him to do penance in 1077, although he was eventually deposed by him. He died in Salerno, in 1085, where he had been taken after his rescue from the castle of St. Angelo by the Normans of Apulia.

Grevy, Francois Paul Jules, born in 1807; French statesman, came to the front at Paris as a defender of republicans in political cases, and in 1848, was elected a member of the constituent assembly. He joined the Côté Gauche, became vice-president of the Assembly, and opposed the presidency of Louis Napoleon. In 1868, his native department (the Jura) returned him for the Assembly, and, on resuming public life, he strongly opposed the second empire. He became president of the Assembly in 1871, and was reelected three times. Between 1873 and 1876, when he was a private member, he strongly opposed the Monarchists, and he afterwards vigorously resisted the schemes of MacMahon, on whose resignation, in 1879, he became President of the Republic, in which office he displayed much tact, and in 1885, made peace with China on his own responsibility. In December of that year he was reelected, but in 1887, was obliged to resign owing to the discovery of his son-in-law's (M. Wilson) implication in the decoration scandals. Died, 1891.

Grey, Lady Jane, born in 1537; grand-niece of Henry VIII.; was appointed heir to the throne by Edward VI. in contravention of the previous settlement of the succession, and having married a son of Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, was made queen and reigned ten days; she was beheaded with Lord Dudley. Died in 1554.

He was now involved in quarrels with his council, and sent in his resignation, which, however, when accepted, he disavowed. The Supreme Court decided in his favor, and he was reappointed. During his first term of office he sold the vale of Rohileund to Sujah Dowlah and obtained the execution of Nuncomar, his enemy. During his second term, in order to obtain money, he took those measures against the Rajah of Benares and the Nabob of Oude which were afterwards charged against him, but left the affairs of the company in a very prosperous condition. Three years after his return he was impeached before the lords for high crimes and misdemeanors, but, after a trial which proceeded at intervals for seven years, and in spite of the eloquence of Burke and Sheridan, he was acquitted in 1795. He was ruined by the expense, but was granted an annuity by the court of directors. Died, 1818.

Hawthorne, Nathaniel, an eminent American romancist, was born at Salem, Mass., in 1804. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1825, and two years later published his "Twice-told Tales," — a work highly spoken of by the "North American Review." In 1846, he was appointed surveyor of the port of Salem, and in 1854, United States Consul at Liverpool, England, a position he held for four years. Hawthorne's reputation will mainly rest upon "The Scarlet Letter," "The House of the Seven Gables," and "The Blithedale Romance," works of the very highest order of merit. Died, 1864.

Hay, John, an American statesman and writer; born in Salem, Ind., 1838. He was graduated from Brown University, and settled in Illinois as a lawyer, but went to Washington in 1861, as one of Lincoln's private secretaries, acting also as his aide-de-camp. He served under generals Hunter and Gillmore with the rank of major and assistant adjutant-general. He was subsequently in the United States diplomatic service, stationed at Paris, Vienna, and Madrid. In 1897, he was made ambassador to England, and in 1898, secretary of state. His literary reputation rests upon "Pike County Ballads," "Castilian Days," a volume of travel; and "Life of Abraham Lincoln" (with J. G. Nicolay). As secretary of state, Mr. Hay gained a standing equal to that of the most eminent men who have held that high office. In coolness, foresight, and statesmanlike appreciation of current and coming events he had no superior among contemporary diplomats. Died, 1905.

Haydn, Joseph, a celebrated musical composer; born in Austria, 1732, and studied under Porpora. In 1791, Haydn produced in London six grand symphonies followed at Vienna, in 1780, by his "chef-d'œuvre," "The Creation." Died, 1809.

Hayes, Rutherford Birchard, the nineteenth president of the United States, succeeding Grant, was born in Ohio, 1822, and practiced law in Cincinnati. Married, in 1852, Lucy Ware Webb. He supported Scott in 1852, Fremont in 1856, and Lincoln for the presidency. He entered the army as major of the 23d Ohio Infantry, and participated in the campaigns of West Virginia and the battles around Winchester; was severely wounded at South Mountain; elected to Congress from Ohio in 1864; twice governor of Ohio; nominated for the presidency by the Republican Convention at Cincinnati, June, 1876, in opposition to S. J. Tilden, of New York; took his seat March 4, 1877. Died, 1893.

Hayne, Robert Young, an American statesman; born in South Carolina in 1791; was admitted to the bar in 1812; served in the war with Great Britain; and at its close returned to his practice in Charleston. He sat in the United States Senate from 1823 to 1832. He was a vigorous opponent of protection, and in 1832 boldly supported in Congress the doctrine of Nullification. Daniel Webster's reply ranks among his ablest speeches. In November, 1832, South Carolina adopted an ordinance of nullification, in December Hayne was elected governor, and the State prepared to resist the federal power by force of arms. A compromise, however, was agreed to and the ordinance was repealed. Hayne died September 24, 1840.

Hazlitt, William, born in 1778; critic and essayist, son of a Nonconformist minister; as an artist became acquainted with Leigh Hunt and Lamb, and published his "Essays on the Principles of Human Action," after which he contributed to the "Examiner" many essays, including "The Round Table," "Table Talk," criticisms on "The Spirit of the Age," and lectured on Elizabethan dramatists at the Surrey Institution. He also wrote "Characters of Shakespeare's Plays," "View of the Contemporary English Stage," and a "Life of Napoleon." Died, 1830.

Hearst, Phebe, philanthropist; born in 1840; maiden name Apperson; married in 1861 George F. Hearst, late United States Senator from California, who died in 1891. Has established and endowed five kindergarten classes for poor children, and a manual training school in San Francisco; several kindergartens, and a kindergarten training school in Washington, D. C.; made donations to the American University, Washington and given $200,000 to build National Cathedral School for girls; has donated from $3,000,000 to $4,000,000 for buildings for the Greater University of California, having previously paid the cost of a competition of the best architects of America and Europe for the plans; maintains a school for mining engineers at the University of California as a memorial to her husband; has built, endowed and given thousands of dollars to free libraries, established working girls' clubs, and done much other educational and charitable work.

Hearst, William Randolph, newspaper publisher; born in San Francisco in 1863; son of late Senator George F. and Phebe Apperson Hearst; educated in public schools, San Francisco, and Harvard. Editor and proprietor of "San Francisco Examiner," 1886; bought "New York Journal," 1895; later bought "Advertiser," to secure news franchise, and consolidated it with the "Journal"; started "Chicago American," 1900. In 1902, changed name of morning issue in Chicago to "The Examiner," and morning issue in New York to "The American." Elected to 58th and 59th congresses, 11th New York district; Democrat. President of National League of Democratic Clubs. Candidate for mayor of New York on Municipal Ownership ticket, 1905; and for governor, 1906. Promoter of the Independence League.

Hedin, Sven Anders, Swedish traveler; born in Stockholm, 1865, and educated at Stockholm and in Germany. He began his explorations in Persia in 1885, and has traveled through Khorasan and Turkestan, several times through Tibet and other parts of Central Asia. His books include "Through Asia, 1898," "Central Asia and Tibet," and "Scientific Results of a Journey in Central Asia 1899-1902."

Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich (hā'-gail), a German metaphysician; born in Stuttgart, 1770, became, in 1801, a lecturer in Jena University; in 1816 entered upon the professorship of philosophy at Heidelberg, and two years later filled a similar chair at Berlin. The Hegelian system of philosophy is looked upon as an attempt to combine the real and the ideal, and, though perhaps but imperfectly understood so far, it is accounted in Germany as forming, or rather associating together, the salient doctrines of the Pantheistic school. Died, 1831.

Heine, Heinrich, German poet; born in 1799 in Düsseldorf of Jewish parents, and sent to Hamburg to prepare for a commercial life, but preferred studying law. At Bonn he was pupil of Schlegel, and at Berlin made the acquaintance of Varnhagen von Ense. In 1825, he renounced Judaism, and after 1830 lived at Paris, where he married Mathilde Mirat. He traveled much, but in 1847 had an attack of paralysis, and soon after became blind. His chief works are "Buch der Lieder," followed by other poems; "Reisebilder," "Der Salon," "Ueber Börne," a satire; "Deutschland ein Wintermärchen," and "Atta Troll." Died, 1856.

Helmholtz, Hermann Ludwig Ferdinand, a German scientist; born in Potsdam, 1821, became professor of physiology at Heidelberg, 1858. He ranks among the ablest of recent natural philosophers; has written many profoundly erudite treatises on the relations of physical forces; and is the inventor of the ophthalmoscope, an instrument for the examination of the ball of the eye. Died, 1894.

Hemans, Felicia Dorothea, née Browne, born in 1793; English verse-writer; wrote "Early Blossoms" before she was 15, and afterwards "Domestic Affections," "Hymns for Children," etc. She died in Dublin, 1835, where she lived after Captain Hemans left her.

Heney, Francis Joseph, lawyer; born in Lima, N. Y., March 17, 1859; resident of San Francisco since 1864; educated at public primary, grammar and night schools, 1866-75, University of California, 1879-80, Hastings Law School, 1883-84. Admitted to bar, September, 1883; in cattle business in Arizona, 1885-89; conducted Indian trader store, Fort Apache, Arizona, 1886-88; practiced law, Tucson, Arizona, 1889-95; took prominent part in litigation by which titles under Mexican land grants in Arizona were settled, and in argument of three land-grant cases before United States Supreme Court; was attorney-general of Arizona, 1893-94; removed to San Francisco, 1895, and confined cases to civil business until urged by United States Attorney-General Knox to undertake land fraud cases at Portland, Ore.; discovered conspiracy of United States Attorney John H. Hall to protect guilty politicians in consideration of reappointment; secured removal and indictment of Hall, and indictment of Senator Mitchell, George C. Brownell, and others.

Hennepin, Louis, a French recollet friar, missionary, and traveler in North America; born in Flanders about 1640. At length he embarked for Canada and arrived at Quebec in 1675. Between that period and 1682 he explored the regions afterward called Louisiana, and returning to Europe, published an account of his researches. The geographical portions of his works are feeble but they present much interest as descriptions of the manners of the aboriginal races which the author visited. He died in Utrecht about 1706.

Henry I., King of England; born in 1068, youngest son of William I., seized the throne on the death of William II. (1100), and forced Robert to be content with Normandy, but deprived him of this also after the battle of Tenchebrai; married Matilda, daughter of Malcolm III. and descendant of the Saxon kings; established "Justices in Eyre," the court of exchequer, and a standard of weights and measures, abolished the curfew, and compromised the Investiture question by an agreement with Paschal II. His charter was the foundation of the Great Charter. Died, 1135.

Henry II., born in 1133, grandson of last-named, and son of Maud and Geoffrey Plantagenet; came to the throne in 1154, married Eleanor of Aquitaine (divorced wife of Louis VII.), and acquired by the marriage Guienne and Poitou; put down private war and jurisdictions, and subdued the last great feudal rising, which was aided by William the Lion, of Scotland, whom he compelled to do homage; was engaged in a long quarrel with Becket as representative of the immunity of clerks from civil jurisdiction, and sanctioned the first expedition against Ireland, afterwards accepting the kingdom. His last years were much troubled by wars with his sons. The most important enactments of his reign were the Assizes of Clarendon and Northampton, and the Assizes of arms, besides the grant of charters to towns. He was the most powerful prince of his time, was offered the imperial throne, and possessed by various titles the greater part of France. Died, 1189.

Henry III., born in 1207, son of John by Isabella of Angoulême; came to the throne in 1216 when a minor, and in the course of a long reign provoked much hostility by his foreign favorites and his submission to papal exactions, discontent culminating in the Barons' War (1262-65), in which he was defeated at Lewes and compelled to submit to control of the government by De Montfort and his friends. These, however, quarreled among themselves, and at Evesham De Montfort was defeated and slain. During this reign the Great Charter (with important clauses omitted) was frequently renewed, and Westminster Abbey was almost entirely built. Died, 1272.

Henry VII., born about 1457; first of the Tudor Dynasty, son of Edmund Tudor and Margaret Beaufort, a descendant of John of Gaunt; invaded England in 1485, and defeated Richard III. at Bosworth, after which he married Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV. His reign was marked by three Yorkist risings, which he defeated, by the measures he enforced against the nobles, by his system of marriages with foreign princes, and the enactment of Poyning's law. Died, 1509.

Henry VIII., born in 1491; son of Henry VII., whom he succeeded in 1509; married Katherine of Aragon, wife of his deceased brother, his divorce from whom was the proximate cause of the Reformation. Papal jurisdiction was renounced, more especially by the Acts of Supremacy and of Appeals, but the king was strongly averse to doctrinal changes. The early years of the reign were marked by a war with France, in which Henry took part in person; attempts at union with Scotland were made, but defeated by French and papal influence; a system of balance was maintained in foreign relations; a large amount of ecclesiastical property was annexed to the Crown, which gained complete control over the Church: the rising called the Pilgrimage of Grace was suppressed; and the king became practically absolute, being granted by parliament the right of making laws by proclamation, and of settling the succession in his will. Died, 1547.

Henry II., King of France, was born in 1519; son of Francis I., whom he succeeded in 1547. By his alliance with the German Protestants, he acquired Metz, Toul, and Verdun, while he also regained Calais from the English. He carried on his father's war with Spain with some success until the disaster at St. Quentin, and died (1559) of a wound inflicted in a tournament held to celebrate its conclusion by the marriage of his daughter and Philip II.

Henry IV., of France, was born in 1553; as son of Anthony of Navarre, a descendant of Louis IX., was founder of the Bourbon Dynasty, succeeding Henry

III. in 1589. His marriage with Marguerite de Valois, in 1572, was the occasion of the Bartholomew massacres. In 1576, he quitted the court and became leader of the Huguenots and opponent of the League, being the rival of the Guises for the succession. He defeated them at Arques and Ivry, but was unable to conquer Paris without becoming a Roman Catholic, which he did in 1593. He concluded peace with Philip II. at Vervins, and issued the Edict of Nantes. The rest of his reign was occupied by domestic reforms. He was assassinated by Ravallac. Died, 1610.

Henry IV., of Germany, born in 1050; son of Henry III., began the Investiture disputes with the papacy, in the course of which he deposed Gregory VII., but was himself excommunicated and deposed, and was obliged to submit at Canossa in 1076, but, in 1084, again invaded Italy, and captured Rome. In Germany he had enemies in Rudolf of Swabia (whom he defeated finally at Wolkshheim in 1080), in the Saxons, and in his sons, Conrad and Henry, by the latter of whom he was dethroned. Died, 1106.

Henry, Joseph, an eminent American physicist; born in Albany, N. Y., in 1797; was appointed professor of natural philosophy in the College of New Jersey at Princeton, in 1832; and, in 1846, was called to the office of secretary or director of the Smithsonian Institution at Washington, to the organization and wide reputation of which he had mostly contributed. Henry made most important discoveries in electro-magnetism. Died, 1878.

Henry, Patrick, born in 1736; American politician, nephew of Robertson and cousin of Lord Brougham; practiced as an advocate in Virginia, where he first came into prominence in 1763, by his pleading in the case of clerical incomes; was an active opponent of the Stamp Act, and the chief leader of the revolution in Virginia, being more extreme in his views than Washington. He was for some years governor of his State, during which he opposed the Federal Constitution as not democratic enough. He was an eloquent but reckless speaker, and was obliged to resume his profession in order to cover his heavy debts. Died, 1799.

Hepburn, William Peters, congressman; born in Wellsville, O., November 4, 1833; taken to Iowa Territory, April, 1841; educated in local schools and in a printing office; admitted to bar, 1854; in Union army, 1861-65; captain, major, and lieutenant-colonel, 2d Iowa cavalry; presidential elector, 1876 and 1888; member of Congress, 1881-87, and since 1893, from 8th Iowa district. Chairman of Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and author of the Hepburn Bill to regulate interstate commerce.

Herbert, Victor, conductor, composer; born in Dublin, Ireland, February 1, 1859. Began musical education in Germany at 7, studying under leading masters; first position of prominence that of principal violoncello player in court orchestra, Stuttgart; heard in concerts throughout Europe before coming to the United States as solo violoncellist in Metropolitan Orchestra, New York, 1886; since then has been connected with Theodore Thomas's, Seidl's, and other orchestral organizations as soloist and conductor. Bandmaster of 22d Regiment Band, New York, since 1894; conductor of Pittsburg, Pa., Orchestra, 1898-1904; Victor Herbert's New York Orchestra since 1904. Composer: "The Captive" (oratorio written for and performed at Worcester, Mass., Festival); "Prince Ananias," "The Wizard of the Nile," "The Serenade," "Cyrano de Bergerac," "The Ameer," "The Viceroy," "The Idol's Eye," "The Fortune Teller," "The Singing Girl," "Babette," "Babes in Toyland," "It Happened in Nordland" (all comic operas). Also several compositions for orchestra, songs, and a concert for violoncello and orchestra.

Herod the Great, born in 73 B. C.; King of Judæa; put to death his wife, Mariamne, and two sons; massacred the children of Bethlehem, and rebuilt the Temple. Died, 3 B. C.

Herodotus, born in Halicarnassus, in Caria, 484 B. C.; an eminent Greek historian, usually called "the Father of History." His great work, for which he appears to have collected the materials during long travel, is believed to have been written at Thurii. It comes down to 478 B. C.; and, except for the author's love of the marvelous, his history is considered one of the most trustworthy of all ancient histories, while in the grace of its style it is unrivaled. The best English translation of Herodotus is probably that by Canon Rawlinson (1858-60). Died, in Thurii, in Italy, about 424 B. C.

Herschel, William, Sir, an eminent astronomer; born in Hanover, in 1738, and died in 1822. Most of his life was spent in England. John Frederick William, his son, who was also distinguished in the same line, was born in England in 1790, and died in 1871.

Hezekiah, son of Ahaz, ascended the throne of Judah in 726 B. C. He uprooted idolatry, and obtained the help of God against the Assyrians under Sennacherib, who had invaded his dominions. Died, 697.

Higginson, Henry Lee, banker; born in New York, November 18, 1834; entered Harvard, 1851, but did not complete course. Employed in counting-house of S. & E. Austin, Boston; then went to Vienna; studied music; served in United States volunteers in Civil War, becoming major and brevetted lieutenant-colonel of 1st Massachusetts cavalry; severely wounded at Aldie, Va., June, 1863; later of Lee, Higginson & Company, bankers, Boston. He has devoted a considerable sum to organization of a symphony orchestra in Boston.

Higginson, Thomas Wentworth, American writer; born in Cambridge, Mass., in 1823; at first a Unitarian minister, entered keenly into the movement against slavery, and was severely wounded during the Civil War. Among his works are "Malbone: an Oldport Romance," and "Oldport Days," "Harvard Memorial Biographies," "Brief Biographies of European Statesmen," "Common-sense About Women," and "Women and Men," "Part of a Man's Life," and many other books.

He has published one or two novels, besides essays and poems, but is best known for his three works, "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," "The Professor at the Breakfast Table," and "The Poet at the Breakfast Table." These first appeared in the "Atlantic Monthly," and are full of a quaint knowledge, breadth of thought, and genial humor which will keep them favorites wherever the English language is spoken. Died, October 7, 1894.

Holst, Hermann Eduard von, a German-American historian; born in Fellin, Livonia, Russia, June 19, 1841. Coming to the United States in 1866, he engaged in literary work and lecturing; he returned to Europe, becoming professor in the universities of Strasburg (1872), and Freiburg (1874); appointed professor in the University of Chicago (1892), he came to this country again. He has written: "Constitutional and Political History of the United States," "Constitutional Law of the United States," "Life of John Calhoun," etc. Died, 1904.

Homer, the greatest name in epic poetry, has come down to us as, unfortunately, little better than a name, and many theories of the origin of the Homeric poetry hardly leave us even the name. The traditions agree in making Homer an Asiatic Greek, probably born at Smyrna about the year 850 B. C. He is represented as blind, and as reciting his poems from place to place. All scholars agree that the poems were not written, but handed down from memory, as there is little evidence that writing was practiced at so early a period. One theory of their authorship is that they are the work or compilation of a company of poets, or Homeric guild, who composed, collected, and handed down in this form these legends of early history. The Iliad and the Odyssey are sometimes referred also to different writers, and sometimes to the early and later periods of Homer's genius. They are the greatest epics of any age; the Iliad is called the "beginning of literature."

Hopkins, Mark, born in 1802; American educationist, principal of Williams College from 1836 to 1872, and professor of moral philosophy, wrote "The Law of Love and Love as a Law," and "An Outline Study of Man." Among his pupils was President Garfield. Died, 1887.

Hopkinson, Francis, born in 1737; American writer, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence; wrote "The Battle of the Kegs" (1778), "The Pretty Story" (1774), "The Political Catechism" (1777), and other works in prose and verse. His son, Joseph (died in 1842), judge of the United States District Court, wrote "Hail Columbia!" Died, 1791.

Horace, Quintus Horatius Flaccus, one of the greatest of Latin poets, born at Venusia, 65 B. C., studied at Rome under Orbilius Pupillus, and completed his education at Athens. He then joined the Roman army, and fought under Brutus at Philippi; thereby occasioning the confiscation of his patrimonial estate. On his return to Rome, he embraced literature as a profession, and was so fortunate as to find a liberal and life-long patron in Mæcenæ. His poetical works consist of odes, satires, and epistles—all replete with elegance of diction and perfect propriety of thought and expression, and withal pervaded by a certain atmosphere of calm and well-bred philosophy, that renders them irresistibly attractive to the minds and tastes of cultivated men. Died, 8 B. C.

Hosmer, Harriet, American sculptor; born in Watertown, Mass., 1830, was a pupil of Gibson at Rome, and executed busts of "Daphne," "Ænone," "Beatrice Cenci," and "Zenobia in Chains." She devised a method for converting Italian limestone into marble. Died, 1908.

Houston, Sam, an American general, was born in Virginia, 1793. He entered Congress in 1823, and four years later became governor of Tennessee. After emigrating to Texas in 1832, he was elected to the chief command of the army which defeated the Mexicans under Santa Ana at San Jacinto, April 21, 1836. He was elected president of Texas the same year, and re-elected in 1841. After the admission of Texas into the Union as a State, Houston twice represented her in the National Senate, and filled the gubernatorial chair in 1859. Died, 1863.

Howard, John, a noted philanthropist, was born in Hackney, Middlesex, 1726. Howard was left in easy circumstances at his father's death. A bitter experience as a French prisoner of war and observations made whilst acting as sheriff of Bedfordshire roused him to attempt some reform of the abuses and misery of prison life; he made a tour of the county jails of England, and the mass of information which he laid before the House of Commons in 1774 brought about the first prison reforms; he continued his visitations from year to year to every part of the United Kingdom, and to every quarter of the continent; during 1785-87, he made a tour of inspection through the principal lazarettos of Europe, visited plague-smitten cities, and voluntarily underwent the rigors of the quarantine system, and finally died, 1790, at the Crimea whilst on a journey to the East. He published at various times accounts of his journeys. His deep piety, cool sense, and single-hearted devotedness to his one great object won him universal respect throughout Europe.

Howe, Julia Ward, an American author; born in New York City, May 27, 1819. A philanthropist, interested especially in woman's suffrage, she was the wife of Dr. Samuel G. Howe, the philanthropist, and with him edited the anti-slavery journal, the "Boston Commonwealth." She is best known as the author of the "Battle Hymn of the Republic" written during a visit to the camps near Washington. Among her works, besides several volumes of verse, are: "The World's Own," a drama; "Life of Margaret Fuller."

Howell, Clark, editor; born in Barnwell County, S. C., September 21, 1863; has lived in Atlanta, Ga., from infancy; graduated from University of Georgia, June, 1883. Entered newspaper work, succeeding Henry Grady as managing editor, "Atlanta Constitution," in 1889, and succeeded his father as editor-in-chief in 1897. In 1901 bought out Colonel W. A. Hemphill's stock in "Constitution" and succeeded him as president of the company. Member of Georgia House of Representatives six years (speaker, 1890-91); member from Georgia of Democratic National Committee since 1892; member and president of Georgia Senate, Atlanta district, since 1900; director of Associated Press of America for past eight years.

Howells, William Dean, American novelist, born in Martinsville, Ohio, 1837; was United States consul at Venice from 1861 to 1865. From 1871 to 1880 he edited the "Atlantic Monthly," but soon began to devote his time to novel-writing. Chief among his novels are "The Lady of the Aroostook," "A Modern Instance," "A Fearful Responsibility," etc., and "The Shadow of a Dream." He also wrote lives of Lincoln and Hayes, "Modern Italian Poets," and some poems.

He became Queen's counsel in 1869, and county court judge in 1882. His chief works are "Tom Brown's School Days," "Tom Brown at Oxford," and "A Memoir of Daniel Macmillan." Died, 1896.

Hugo, Victor Marie, French poet and romance writer; born of noble parents in Besançon, 1802; began to write verse at the age of 14, and soon deserting classic models, became the founder, with Sainte-Beuve and others, of the French romantic school. In like manner his early royalism gave place to ardent republicanism. "Cromwell," "Le Dernier Jour d'un Condamné," "Marion Delorme," and, above all, "Hernani," were strongly censured by the Académie; but Charles X. would not prohibit the performance of the last. "Le Roi s'amuse," was, however, interdicted by the ministry. Between the years 1830-40 appeared also "Nôtre-Dame de Paris," and several volumes of verse, and the poet was elected to the Académie in 1841. In 1845 he also became "pair de France." In 1848, he was elected by Paris to the Constitutional Assembly, and acted with the moderates, but in the next Assembly he became one of the orators of the left, and, having attempted to resist the coup d'état of Louis Napoleon, was banished in 1851. He lived chiefly in Jersey and Guernsey, and wrote "Les Contemplations" and "La Légendes des Siècles." He refused to avail himself of the amnesties of 1859 and 1869, but returned to Paris in 1870. In 1866, appeared "Les Travailleurs de la Mer," and, after the return, "Quatre-vingt Treize," "L'Histoire d'un Crime," and many other works. "Hernani" was revived in 1867, and Hugo became a senator in 1879. He was buried in the Panthéon, which was secularized for the purpose. Chief among his lyrics were his early "Odes et Ballades," "Les Feuilles d'Automne," "Les Chants du Crépuscule," "Les Rayons et les Ombres," and "Chansons des Rues et des Bois." The romance "Les Misérables," was translated into twelve languages. Died, 1885.

Hull, Isaac, an American naval officer; born in Derby, Conn., March 9, 1775. In July, 1812, he commanded the frigate "Constitution," which was chased by a British squadron for three days, but escaped by skillful sailing. While cruising in the Gulf of St. Lawrence he met the British frigate "Guerriere," which, after a bloody fight of half an hour, surrendered, August 19, 1812. The "Guerriere" was so injured in the battle that she soon sunk. The British ship lost 100 men; the "Constitution" had fourteen men killed and wounded, and within an hour or so was ready for another fight. This was the first naval battle of the War of 1812, and Congress gave Captain Hull a gold medal for his services. He died in Philadelphia, Pa., February 3, 1843.

Hum'boldt, Friedrich Heinrich Alex., Baron von, great traveler and naturalist, born in Berlin, 1769, devoted all his life to the study of nature in all its departments, traveling all over the continent, and in 1800, with Aimé Bonpland for companion, visiting South America, traversing the Orinoco, and surveying and mapping out in the course of five years, Venezuela, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, and Mexico, the results of which he published in his "Travels." His chief work is the "Kosmos," or an account of the visible universe, in four volumes, originally delivered as lectures in Paris in the winter of 1827-28. He was a friend of Goethe, who held him in the highest esteem. Died, 1859.

Hume, David (hūm), an eminent historian, born in Edinburgh, 1711, after laying the basis of a great literary reputation by his "Treatise on Human Nature," produced "Essays, Moral, Political, and Literary," and other works, published between the years 1754 and 1761. His celebrated "History of England," for two generations esteemed the ablest work of its class, was considered by many critics open to objection on the score of skepticism and undue partiality. Died, 1776.

Hunter, John, the most eminent English anatomist of modern times; born near Glasgow in 1728; became surgeon of St. George's Hospital, London, and a Fellow of the Royal Society, and acquired high celebrity by his discoveries in comparative anatomy and physiology. Died, 1793.

Huss, or Hus, Johann, born probably in 1369; Bohemian reformer, attacked abuses in Prague University and among the clergy, and opposed German predominance. He was excommunicated by John XXIII. for giving adhesion to Wycliffe's doctrines, and afterwards wrote his "Tractatus de Ecclesiâ." Having gone to the council of Constance under a safe-conduct from the emperor, his enemies procured his imprisonment as a heretic, and, on refusal to retract, he was burnt. Died, 1415.

Huxley, Thomas Henry, an English biologist and essayist; born in Ealing, England, May 4, 1825. He was graduated at London University in 1845. In 1846-1850 he sailed around the world as a naval surgeon. In 1851 he was made F. R. S. by the Royal Society; he became professor of natural history in the School of Mines in 1854; hunterian professor in the Royal College of Surgeons in 1863; president of the British Geological and Ethnological Societies in 1869; secretary of the Royal Society in 1872; Lord Rector of Aberdeen University in 1872; and president of the Royal Society in 1883. He was an able advocate of Darwinian evolution, and was perhaps best known to the popular apprehension by his agnostic speculations, in expounding which he came into controversy with the defenders of Theism and Christianity. He wrote a number of scientific works. He died in Eastbourne, England, June 29, 1895.

Huyghens, Christian, born in 1629; Dutch natural philosopher and astronomer; was compelled to leave

Paris by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. He had been invited to France by Colbert, and during his residence there visited England, and was made Fellow of the Royal Society. He applied the pendulum to clocks, ascertained the laws of collision of elastic bodies, and discovered the rings of Saturn. Died, 1695.

Hypatia, born about 370; daughter of Theon, head of the Platonic school of Alexandria, gave public lectures in philosophy, but was brutally murdered by the partisans of the Patriarch Cyril. Died, 415.

Ibsen, Henrik, born in 1828; Norwegian dramatist, appointed director of the theater at Bergen in 1852, and, in 1857, of that at Christiania. Among his plays are "Brand," "Peer Gynt," "The Pillars of Society," "The Doll's House," "Ghosts," etc. Died, 1906.

Ingalls, Melville Ezra, railroad president; born in Harrison, Me., September 6, 1842; brought up on a farm; educated in Bridgeton Academy and studied in Bowdoin College; graduate of Harvard Law School, 1863; practiced first at Gray, Me., but soon removed to Boston; member of Massachusetts Senate, 1867. President in 1870, receiver in 1871, of the Indianapolis, Cincinnati & Lafayette Railroad, and from bankrupt condition, with aid of reorganizations in 1873 and 1880, put its successor, the Cincinnati, Indianapolis, St. Louis & Chicago, upon a sound footing, consolidating it with other roads into the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad, of which he is chairman (comprising the "Big Four" system); also from October 1, 1888, until February, 1900, president of Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company; president of Merchants' National Bank, Cincinnati. Was Democratic candidate for mayor of Cincinnati, 1903; president of National Civic Federation, 1905.

Ingersoll, Robert Green, born in 1833; American lawyer; was colonel of a federal regiment, 1862-65; and, in 1866, State attorney-general. Was a well-known orator and anti-Christian lecturer. Died, 1899.

Innocent III., Pope, born about 1160; son of Count Trasimund, a Roman noble; elected in 1198, aimed at making the papacy supreme in all European affairs. In 1212, he deposed the Emperor Otho, setting up Frederick II. in his place. His dispute with John of England concerning the appointment of Langton to the See of Canterbury, lasted from 1207 to 1213. In that year John admitted Langton, and surrendered England to the pope, at the same time receiving it back as a papal fief. Innocent favored the fourth crusade (1200). Died, 1216.

Ireland, John, Roman Catholic Archbishop of St. Paul since May, 1888; born in Ireland, September 11, 1838; came to United States in boyhood. Educated in Cathedral School, St. Paul; studied theology, France; (LL. D., Yale, 1901); ordained priest, December 21, 1861; chaplain of 5th Minnesota regiment in Civil War; rector cathedral, St. Paul; secretary and later coadjutor to Bishop Grace, of St. Paul; consecrated December 21, 1875. Author: "The Church and Modern Society," etc.

Irving, Sir Henry (John Henry Brodribb), actor; born in Keinton, near Glastonbury, in 1838; acted at the Theater Royal, Edinburgh, from 1856 to 1859, and afterwards for seven years at Manchester. He played in London in 1859, but attracted little notice till his appearance at St. James' Theater in 1866. He soon established a connection with the Lyceum, of which he became manager in 1878. There he played his chief parts, in conjunction with Miss Ellen Terry, producing, amongst other plays, "Hamlet," "The Merchant of Venice," "Faust," "Macbeth," "Henry VIII.," "The Bells," and other well-known productions. Died, 1905.

Irving, Washington, born in 1783; American man of letters, son of a New York merchant; was admitted to the bar in 1806, but devoted himself to literature. In 1810, he became a partner in his brother's commercial establishment, which failed in 1817. He lived in Europe from 1815 to 1832, acting as secretary to the American embassy in London from 1829 to 1831. From 1842 to 1846, he was United States minister to Spain. Among his works are "Knickerbocker's History of New York," "Geoffrey Crayon's Sketch Book," "The Life of Columbus," "The Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada," and lives of "Mahomet" and "Washington." Died, 1859.

Isabella of Castile, born in 1451; daughter of John II.; was married to Ferdinand of Aragon in 1469, and, in 1474, succeeded her brother, Henry IV., on the throne of Castile. Isabella promoted the expedition of Columbus. She was a wise and humane ruler, but her religious zeal led her to consent to the establishment of the Inquisition. Died, 1504.

Isaiah was one of the most eminent of the Hebrew prophets. He was the son of Amoz, but of his personal history very little is known. He prophesied under Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah. His prophecies, though delivered later in point of time than several of those uttered by other prophets, occupy, in our Bible, the first place, both on account of their bulk, and for the sublimity and importance of the predictions.

Ito, Marquis Hirobumi, a Japanese statesman; born in the province of Choshu, in 1841. In 1871, visited the United States to examine the coinage system, and on return to Japan was successful in establishing a mint at Osaka. In 1878, was transferred from the office of minister of public works to the home office. He became prominent in the Japanese cabinet in 1886, and made many reforms. In 1897-98, made a tour of the United States and Europe. In the latter year he visited China to arrange an alliance between that country and his own; in 1900, on the resignation of Yamagata ministry, he was summoned by the emperor to form a cabinet. Revisited the United States in 1901. Assassinated in Corea, 1909.

Jackson, Andrew, the seventh President of the United States, was born in South Carolina, March 15, 1767, of Irish parentage. After a harum-scarum youth, Jackson, in 1788, commenced the practice of the law in Nashville, Tenn., and became that State's sole representative in Congress in 1796, and senator in the following year. Between 1798 and 1804, he served as a judge of the Supreme Court of Tennessee; in 1806, killed Mr. Charles Dickinson in a duel; in 1807, appeared as the champion of Aaron Burr; and, in 1812, upon the breaking out of hostilities with England, offered his services to the Government. In 1813, he was severely wounded in a duel fought with Colonel Benton, and defeated the Creeks at Talladega in the same year. In May, 1814, after receiving the appointment of major-general in the United States Army, he commanded in the battle won over the British Army at New Orleans, in January, 1815. This great victory raised the reputation of Jackson as a general to the highest point, and made him the idol of a large portion of the American people. In 1817-18, General Jackson conducted the Seminole War to a successful conclusion, and was appointed governor of Florida in 1821. Two years later he was an unsuccessful aspirant for the presidency, to which office he was, however, elected in 1828, and reflected at the end of his four-years' term, in 1832. Among the chief occurrences during his double tenure of office were: the grant of a new charter to the Bank of the United States; the proclamation denouncing the South Carolina Nullification movement; and the senatorial censure passed on the president for his authorizing the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States. Died, June 8, 1845.

Jackson, Thomas Jonathan, better known the world over as "Stonewall Jackson," an American general; born in Lewis County, Virginia, in 1824, and graduated at West Point Academy in 1846. After serving with distinction in the Mexican War, Jackson became a professor in the Military Institute at Lexington, Va., until the outbreak of the Civil War. Appointed brigadier-general in the Confederate service at the battle of Bull Run, July 21, 1861, his command on that occasion "stood like a stone wall," to use the words of a distinguished general present. In September, he received the rank of major-general; defeated General Banks at Strasburg, May 23, 1862; fought an indecisive battle with Fremont at Cross Keys, June 8th; commanded a corps in the battle of Gaines' Mill, June 27th, and Malvern Hill, July 1st; again defeated General Banks at Cedar Mountain, August 9th; captured Harper's Ferry with 11,000 Federal prisoners, September 15th; commanded a corps at Antietam, September 17th; and was made lieutenant-general for his services in largely contributing to the National defeat at Fredericksburg, December 13, 1862. On May 2, 1863, by a clever flank movement, he defeated the 11th corps of General Hooker's army at Chancellorsville; and on the evening of the same day was fired at by a patrol party of his own men, who mistook him and his staff, in the darkness, for a detachment of Union cavalry, and died of his wounds on the 10th.

Jacquard, Joseph Marie (zhah-kahr), a French mechanic and inventor, was born in 1752, and died in 1834. His invention of the Jacquard loom revolutionized the art of weaving.

Jefferson, Thomas, third President of the United States, was born in Virginia, 1743, and, after graduating at William and Mary College, was admitted to the bar in 1767. He practiced law with signal success, and in 1769, became a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses, and in 1773, a delegate to the first Continental Congress, where he assisted in framing the celebrated "Summary View of the Rights of British America." In 1775, he took his seat in the Continental Congress, and with a commanding voice in its deliberations, so that in the year following he was appointed chairman of the committee which drew up the Declaration of Independence. In 1779, he succeeded Patrick Henry in the governorship of Virginia. In 1783, he acted as chairman of the committee charged with the report to Congress of the treaty of peace entered into at Paris, 1783, and, two years later, succeeded Franklin as minister at Paris. On his return, in 1789, he entered General Washington's first cabinet as secretary of state. In this position he gradually came to be considered the head of the Democratic party. In 1793, he resigned office, and four years afterwards became Vice-President of the United States, and ex-officio president of the Senate. In 1801, he was elected to the presidency, and during his first administration the Louisiana Purchase was effected. He retired to private life, 1809, at the close of his second term. Died, 1826.

Jenner, Edward, famous as the discoverer of vaccination, was born in 1749, in Berkeley, England; died there, 1823. After many years devoted to the consideration of, and experiments made with, vaccine lymph as a specific for smallpox, Jenner was for the first time, in 1796, enabled to satisfy many medical men of the valid properties of this new agent as a preventive of the disease.

Jeremi'ah, in Scripture one of the greatest of the Hebrew prophets, and author of the book which bears his name, and of "Lamentations." He flourished in the Sixth Century, B. C.

Jeroboam, two kings of Israel bore this name, viz., one who was elected, 975 B. C., by the ten tribes who had rebelled against Rehoboam. Died, 954. The other, a son of Joash, ascended the throne about 825 B. C., and filled it for forty-one years. Died, 784 B. C.

Jerome, or Hieronymus, St., born about 346, in Stridon, in Dalmatia, of Christian parents, studied at Rome under Donatus; after traveling in Gaul and elsewhere, adopted a studious and ascetic life, spending four years in the desert of Chalcis, in Syria; was ordained presbyter in 378; visited Constantinople, where he became the friend and pupil of Gregory Nazianzen; returning to Rome, became secretary to Pope Damasus, but after his death (384) withdrew to the Holy Land, accompanied by Paula, Eustochium, and other Roman ladies devoted to the ascetic life. For the remainder of his days he presided over a monastery established by Paula at Bethlehem. Here he completed his translation of the Bible from Hebrew into Latin, known as the Vulgate. He wrote numerous commentaries on the Old and New Testaments, and was engaged in controversies with Rufinus, the Pelagians, and others. Died in 420.

Jerome, William Travers, lawyer; born in New York, April 18, 1859; educated at Williston Seminary and Amherst College (honorary A. M.); graduated from Columbia Law School, 1884; admitted to bar, 1884; justice of special sessions, 1895-1902; district attorney New York County, elected 1901; Democrat. Re-elected as independent candidate, 1905. Author: "Liquor Tax Law in New York."

Jesus Christ (Iesous, the Greek form of Joshua or Jeshua, contracted from Jehoshua, meaning, help of Jehovah, or saviour; Christos, anointed), the Son of God, the Saviour of men, whose birth, life, and death were predicted by prophets, and attended with miraculous manifestations of divine power; was born of the Virgin Mary, of the tribe of Judah, who was betrothed to Joseph, the descendant and heir of the house of David. Two genealogies of Joseph are given—one by Matthew, chapter one; the other by Luke, chapter four. The former is supposed to contain the list of heirs of the house of David, whether by direct or indirect descent; the other the direct ancestors of Joseph. It was foretold that Christ should be of the seed of Abraham and the son of David. The place of His birth was Bethlehem; the time, according to the received chronology, was in the year of Rome 754. Scholars are now almost unanimously agreed that this date is too late, and it is generally placed about four years earlier. The coming of a forerunner to the Saviour, John the Baptist, in the spirit and power of Elias, was foretold by an angel (Luke i: 17). The angel Gabriel announced to Mary that the power of the Highest should overshadow her, and that she should bear a son who should rule over the house of Jacob forever; and on the night of His birth an angel appeared to some shepherds, and announced the coming of a Saviour. On the eighth day He was circumcized according to the law of Moses, and on the fortieth was presented in the temple, where the aged Simeon pronounced Him to be the light of nations and the glory of Israel. Herod ordered the extirpation of all children of Bethlehem and its vicinity of the age of less than two years, for the purpose of effecting the death of Jesus. But Joseph, being miraculously warned of the danger, fled to Egypt with the Virgin and her child, and on his return, after the death of Herod, went to reside at Nazareth in Galilee, whence Jesus is called a Nazarene. We have no further accounts of the earlier years of Jesus, except the remarkable scene in the temple when He was 12 years old, and the general observation of Luke, that He remained in Nazareth with His parents and served them. At the age of about 30 (Luke iii: 23), He was baptized by John in the River Jordan, the Spirit of God descending upon Him like a dove, and a voice from heaven proclaiming, "Thou art my beloved Son; in thee I am well pleased." Previously, however, to entering on His office of divine teacher He retired to a solitary place, where He passed forty days in fasting, meditation, and prayer, previous to the remarkable scene of the temptation described by the evangelists — Matt., chap. iv.; Mark i: 12-13; Luke, chap. iv. He was afterward transfigured in the presence of three of His disciples, when Moses and Elias appeared to Him from heaven, and His raiment became white and shining, and His face shone as the sun. On this occasion again, a voice came from heaven saying, "This is my beloved Son; hear ye Him" (Matt., chap. xvii.; Mark, chap. ix.; Luke, chap. ix., verses 28-36). His mission is generally considered to have occupied three years, spent in acts of mercy (chiefly miraculous), in inculcating a purer system of morals, more exalted notions of God, and more elevating views of man and his destiny than had yet been presented to the world. His doctrine is embodied chiefly in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt., chap. v.-vii., and Luke, chap. vi.), containing the form of prayer He taught to His disciples, commonly called the Lord's Prayer; in His discourses to the Jews in John, chap. v.-viii. and x.; to His disciples, chap. xiv.-xvi.; and His intercessory prayer, chap. xvii. He chose twelve apostles to be the companions of His ministry, the witnesses of His miracles, and the depositories of His doctrine; and He was betrayed into the power of His enemies by one of these with the mockery of a friendly salutation. Betrayed by one, denied by another, and abandoned by all, He was carried before the Jewish priests, found guilty, and by them delivered over to the Roman magistrates, who alone had the power of life and death. Condemned to death as a disturber of the public peace, He was nailed to the cross on Mount Calvary, and it was in the agonies of this bitter death that He prayed for the forgiveness of His executioners, and with a touching act of filial love commended His mother to His favorite disciple. The evangelists relate that from the hour of noon the sun was darkened and three hours after, Jesus, having cried out, "It is finished!" gave up the ghost. The veil of the temple, they add, was torn asunder, the earth shook, rocks were rent, and the tombs opened. The centurion who was present, directing the execution, exclaimed, "Truly this was the Son of God!" The body of Jesus was taken down by Joseph of Arimathea and placed in a tomb, about which the Jewish priests, remembering His prophecy that He should rise on the third day, set a guard, sealing up the door. Notwithstanding these precautions His prophecy was fulfilled by His resurrection on the first day of the week (Sunday), and He appeared repeatedly to His disciples to encourage, console, and instruct them. On the fortieth day after His resurrection, while with them on the Mount of Olives, after He had given them instructions to teach and proselytize all nations, promising them the gift of the Holy Spirit, a cloud received Him out of their sight, and He was taken up to heaven. While the disciples stood gazing after Him two men in white apparel appeared to them, and predicted His coming again in like manner as they had seen Him go. See the closing chapters of the four evangelists and Acts i: 1-14.

Joan of Arc. See Arc, Joan of.

John, St., called the Baptist, son of Zacharias, a priest of the Jews, and of Elizabeth, was the cousin of Mary, the mother of Jesus. He early exercised the apostolic call, and began to preach in the valley of the Jordan, where Jesus received baptism at his hands. He afterwards suffered imprisonment and death by command of Herod.

John, St., the Apostle; born about 4; was one of the earliest of Christ's disciples. During the crucifixion our Lord commended His mother to his care, and he "took her to his own home." John afterwards became Bishop of Ephesus. According to Tertullian, he was plunged into a caldron of boiling oil during the persecution under Domitian, but received no injury. He was subsequently exiled to the island of Patmos, where he wrote the "Book of Revelation." He was also author of the Gospel and Epistles which bear his name. Died about 99.

John XXII., Pope (Jacques d' Euse); born about 1244; a native of Cahors, was elected in 1316, during the "Babylonish Captivity." He was at variance with the Emperor Louis of Bavaria, whom he excommunicated in 1324. He was nominally deposed by Louis in 1327, but continued to exercise the papal functions at Avignon. Died, 1334.

Johnson, Andrew, seventeenth President of the United States, was born in Raleigh, N. C., in 1808. By trade a tailor, and a self-educated man, he became a member of the Legislature of Tennessee (his adopted State); was elected to Congress, 1843-53, and became governor of Tennessee in 1853, and again in 1855. In 1857, he was elected to the National Senate, and, in 1862, appointed military governor of his State. Elected Vice-President of the Union by the Republican party in 1864, he was sworn in as President in the following year, on the assassination of Mr. Lincoln. In this position, his opposition to the measures adopted by Congress for the reconstruction of the Southern States involved him in a struggle, which ended in 1868, with his impeachment on charges of high crimes and misdemeanors against the state. He was accordingly brought to trial, March 13th, and acquitted on the 26th of May following. In January, 1875, he was elected to the United States Senate for the second time. Died, July 31, 1875.

Johnson, Dr. Samuel, a distinguished English writer and lexicographer, was born in Litchfield, England, September 18, 1709. He was educated in his father's library and at Oxford, where he spent an unhappy period. After a varied and precarious early career, he slowly gained a foremost place in the literature of his day. Among many great works the most useful to mankind was his "Dictionary." In 1759, he wrote his celebrated romance of "Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia," which fine production he composed in the evenings of one week in order to defray the funeral expenses of his aged mother. He died at London, December 13, 1784. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey with great solemnity, and his statue was placed in St. Paul's Cathedral. Among his works are "Lives of the Poets," "The Rambler," and "The Vanity of Human Wishes."

Johnson, Eastman, artist; born in Lovell, Me., in 1824; educated in public schools, Augusta, Me.; studied two years in Royal Academy, Düsseldorf. Among many notable genre pictures are "The Kentucky Home," "Husking Bee," "The Stage Coach," "Pension Agent," "Prisoner of State," and portraits "Two Men," ex-President Arthur, Cleveland, and Harrison; W. H. Vanderbilt, Commodore Vanderbilt, Secretary Folger, Daniel Webster, John Quincy Adams, Wm. B. Astor, John D. Rockefeller, W. D. Sloane, Mrs. Alexander Hamilton, Mrs. Dolly Madison (from life), Mrs. August Belmont, Mrs. Hamilton Fish, Mr. and Mrs. I. A. Burden, Mrs. W. T. Blodgett; College Presidents McCosh, Noah Porter, Barnard, and Andrew White; Charles O'Connor, Wheeler H. Peckham, Longfellow, Hawthorne, Emerson, Bishop Potter, Morris K. Jesup, etc. Represented in the Metropolitan Museum of Art and Lenox Galleries, New York; Corcoran Gallery, White House and Treasury Building, Washington; capitol at Albany; Knickerbocker, Century, and Union League Clubs, Chamber of Commerce, etc., New York. Died, 1906.

Johnson, John A., journalist, governor of Minnesota from 1904 until his death in 1909; born in St. Peter, Minn., July 28, 1861; educated in public schools, St. Peter. Care of family devolving upon him at 12, went to work in printing office in St. Peter, and continued in that business, becoming member of firm of Essler & Johnson, publishers of the St. Peter "Herald," of which he was editor. Democrat. Served seven years in Minnesota National Guard, becoming captain. Was State senator from St. Peter district, and prominent candidate for presidential nomination, 1908.

Johnson, Tom Loftin, capitalist, mayor; born Georgetown, Ky., July 18, 1854; went to Indiana in boyhood; educated there; clerk in street railway office, Louisville, Ky., 1869-75; invented several street railway devices; bought a street railway in Indianapolis; later acquired large street railway interests in Cleveland, Detroit, and Brooklyn; is also iron manufacturer in Cleveland. Member of Congress, 1891-95; prominent advocate of the "single-tax" theories of late Henry George. He has now practically retired from business and is devoting his entire time to taxation questions, municipal reform and official duties; mayor of Cleveland since 1901.

Johnston, Albert Sydney, a distinguished American Confederate general, was born in Kentucky, in 1803, and graduated at West Point in 1826. In 1837, he superseded General Houston as commander-in-chief of the Texan army; next became Texan war secretary, and served as a colonel of American regulars during the Mexican War. In 1857, he commanded the expedition sent against the Mormons of Utah; and in 1860, was made military commander of the department of Kentucky and Tennessee, by the so-called Confederate Government. After the surrender of Fort Donelson, he formed a junction with the army of General Beauregard, and fell in the battle of Shiloh, April 6, 1862.

Johnston, Joseph Eggleston, born in 1807; American soldier, joined the Confederate army, and became commander of the Federal forces in South Carolina in February, 1865, but surrendered with his army in the following August. Died, 1891.

Jonathan, son of Saul, and the bosom friend of David, who bewailed his untimely death in one of the most beautiful of his songs. Also, a son of Mattathias, and brother of Judas Maccabeus. He succeeded his brother Judas in the leadership of the Jews, and was made high-priest by Alexander Balas. After some vicissitudes of fortune, he renewed the league his brother had formed with the Romans, and was at last treacherously slain by Tryphon.

Jokai, Maurice, born in 1825; Hungarian novelist; took part as a journalist in the revolution of 1848; has written about 200 novels, including "Timar's Two Worlds," "Black Diamonds," "The Romance of the Coming Century," etc. Died, 1904.

Jones, Paul (real name John Paul), a brilliant American naval commander in the Revolution, was born in Scotland in 1747. After the conclusion of peace with Great Britain, he became rear-admiral in the Russian service, but was dismissed on account of a private quarrel, and died in Paris (1792) in poverty.

Jonson, Benjamin, or Ben, born about 1574; dramatist, was educated at Westminster under Camden. It is uncertain whether he studied at Cambridge. After following the trade of a bricklayer, he went as a volunteer to Flanders, and on his return became an actor, also writing plays in conjunction with others. His first independent work, "Every Man in His Humour," was followed by "Every Man Out of His Humour," "Cynthia's Revels," "Sejanus," "Volpone," "The Alchemist," and many others. Died, 1637.

Jordan, David Starr, president of Leland Stanford Jr. University; born in Gainesville, N. Y., January 19, 1851; graduate of Cornell, M. S., 1872; M. D., Indiana Medical College, 1875 (Ph. D., Butler University, 1878; LL. D., Cornell, 1886, Johns Hopkins, 1902). Professor in various collegiate institutions, 1872-79; assistant to United States Fish Commission, 1877-91; professor of zoölogy, 1879-85, and president, 1885-91, Indiana University; president of Leland Stanford University since 1891; president of California Academy of Sciences, 1896-98; also United States commissioner in charge of fur seal investigations, etc. Author: "A Manual of Vertebrate Animals of Northern United States," "Science Sketches," "Fishes of North and Middle America," "Footnotes to Evolution," "Matka and Kotik," "Care and Culture of Men," "The Innumerable Company," "Imperial Democracy," "Animal Life," "Animal Forms" (with V. L. Kellogg and H. Heath); "The Strength of Being Clean," "Standeth God Within the Shadow," "To Barbara" (verse), "The Philosophy of Despair," "The Blood of the Nation," "Food and Game Fishes of North America" (with B. W. Evermann), "A Guide to the Study of Fishes," "Voice of the Scholar," "The Call of the Twentieth Century"; also numerous papers on ichthyology in proceedings of various societies and government bureaus.

Joseph. In Scripture, one of the twelve patriarchs, the favorite son of Jacob, said to have been born in Mesopotamia. He was sold by his envious brothers and taken to Egypt as a slave, but rose to be prime minister. Also the name of the husband of Mary, mother of the Saviour. Two German emperors bore this name. Joseph I., born in 1678, was made King of Hungary and of the Romans, and succeeded his father Leopold I. as emperor in 1705, and died in 1711. Joseph II., born in 1741, succeeded his father, Francis I., in 1765, and died in 1790.

Joshua, or Hoshea, son of Nun; commander of the Israelites after the death of Moses, led them into the Holy Land, and obtained many victories over the tribes of Canaan.

Josiah succeeded his father, Amon, as King of Judah in 641. He died in a war with Pharaoh Necho, King of Egypt, in 609 B. C.

Joubert, Petrus Jacobus, born in 1831; one of the triumvirate who organized a Transvaal revolt against the British Government in 1880, held the chief command in the engagements at Laing's Nek, Ingogo River, and Majuba Hill. In 1899, was commander-in-chief of the Boer forces in the war with England. Died, 1900.

Joule, James Prescott, born in 1818; electrician, pupil of Dalton; made discoveries in electro-magnetism, and, in 1849, established his theory of the mechanical equivalent of heat. Died, 1889.

Jourdan, Jean Baptiste, Comte, born in 1762; French marshal; served in the wars of the republic, and, in 1799, was appointed commander of the army of the Danube by the Directory. In 1797, he became president of the Council of Five Hundred, but was expelled in 1799, owing to his opposition to Bonaparte, by whom, however, he was afterwards employed. He subsequently followed the fortunes of Joseph Bonaparte. He owed his title to Louis XVIII., but joined in the revolution of 1830. Died, 1833.

Jowett, Benjamin, M. A.; born in 1817; successively scholar, fellow, and master of Balliol College, Oxford, and Regius professor of Greek since 1855. His works include translations of Plato and Thucydides. He contributed a paper on "The Interpretation of Scripture to 'Essays and Reviews.'" Died, 1893.

Judas Iscariot, one of the twelve disciples chosen by Jesus, and the one who betrayed his Master for thirty pieces of silver; after which he very properly "went and hanged himself."

Jude, St., or Judas. One of the apostles, brother of St. James the Less, and supposed to have been martyred at Berytus about the year 80. The "Epistle" which bears his name is one of the smallest and least important books in the canon of the New Testament, and one whose canonical authority has been much disputed both in ancient and quite modern times.

Judith. A heroine of Israel, whose name has been given to one of the Apocryphal books of the Bible. She is said to have by artifice gained the tent of the Assyrian general, Holofernes, at Bethulia, whom she decapitated during his sleep; bearing away his gory head in triumph. The most general opinion among critics is that the history of Judith is a Jewish romance, written, probably in the age of the Maccabees, in order to animate the Jews in their struggles against the Assyrians.

Judson, Harry Pratt, president of the University of Chicago, since 1906; born in Jamestown, N. Y., December 20, 1849; graduate of Williams, 1870 (A. M., 1883; LL. D., 1893; LL. D., 1903, Queens University, Canada). Teacher and principal of high school, Troy, N. Y., 1870-85; professor of history, University of Minnesota, 1885-92; was co-editor of "American Historical Review." Author: "History of the Troy Citizens' Corps," "Cæsar's Army," "Cæsar's Commentaries" (co-editor), "Europe in the Nineteenth Century," "The Growth of the American Nation," "The Higher Education as a Training for Business," "The Latin in English," "The Mississippi Valley" (in Shaler's United States of America), "The Young American," "The Government of Illinois," "Graded Literature Readers" (co-editor), "The Essentials of a Written Constitution."

Jugurtha, a king of Numidia at the end of the Second Century, B. C., was the grandson of Massanissa, but illegitimate, and brought up by Micipsa, along with his own sons, and left a share of the kingdom by him at his death. He, however, murdered both of them, and made himself master of the whole. The Romans, therefore, made war upon him, and after a long struggle he was conquered, made prisoner, led in triumph by Marius, and starved to death in prison at Rome, 106 B. C.

Julian, Julianus Flavius Claudius, surnamed "The Apostate," a nephew of the Emperor Constantine the Great, was born in Constantinople, A. D. 331, and was Emperor of Rome from A. D. 361 to 363. He was one of the best emperors of the later period, but he is chiefly remembered by his unwise and necessarily unsuccessful attempt to restore the effete and dethroned paganism of Rome.

Julius II., Pope (Cardinal Giuliano della Rovere), born in 1443; distinguished as a warrior and patron of the arts; became pope in 1503. He endeavored to extend the papal territory, and, after driving Cæsar Borgia from the Romagna, formed the league of Cambrai with Maximilian and Louis XII. against Venice (1508). After the submission of the republic, he turned his arms against France (1510). In 1511, the Holy Alliance was formed, and the French army driven back over the Alps. Died, 1513.

Justinian I., Emperor of the East; born in 483; succeeded his uncle, Justin I., in 527. He issued a famous code, forming, together with his collections of "Pandects," "Institutiones," and "Novellæ," the "corpus juris civilis." Under Justinian, the boundaries of the empire were much extended through the victories of Belisarius and Narses over the Persians, Vandals, and Ostrogoths. Died, 565.

Juvenal, a celebrated Latin poet and satirist, born in Aquinum; a friend of Martial and contemporary of Statius and Quintilian; his satires, sixteen in number, are written in indignant scorn of the vices of the Romans under the empire, and in the descriptions of which the historian finds a portrait of the manners and morals of the time (42-120).

Kant, Immanuel, a celebrated German philosopher; born in Königsberg, 1724; was the son of a saddler, of Scotch descent, and fortunate in both his parents. He entered the university in 1740, as a student of theology; gave himself to the study of philosophy, mathematics, and physics; wrote an essay, his first literary effort, on "Motive Force" in 1747; settled at the university as a private lecturer on a variety of academic subjects in 1755; became professor of logic and metaphysics in 1770, when he was 46, and continued till his retirement, in 1797, from the frailties of age, spending the last seven years of his life in a small house with a garden in a quiet quarter of the town. His great work, the "Kritic of Pure Reason," was published in 1781, and it was followed by the "Kritic of Practical Reason" in 1788, and the "Kritic of Judgment" in 1790. His works inaugurate a new era in philosophic speculation, and by the adoption of a critical method dealt a death-blow to speculative dogmatism on the one hand and skepticism on the other. It was, he says, the skepticism of Hume that first broke his dogmatic slumber, so that had Hume not been, he had not been, and the whole course of modern thought might be different. Kant by his critical method did for philosophy what Copernicus did for astronomy; he centralized the intelligence in the reason or soul, as the latter did the planetary system in the sun. Kant was a lean, little man, of simple habits, and was never wedded. Died, 1804.

Kaufmann, Angelica, painter; born in Chur in 1741; in 1766 went to England. She was elected a member of the Royal Academy in 1768. In 1783 she married the Venetian artist, Antonio Zucchi, and thenceforward lived in Italy. Died, 1807.

Kean, Charles John, actor; born in Waterford, in 1811; son of Edmund Kean; was educated at Eton; made his debut at Drury Lane in 1827, but did not establish his reputation till 1838, when he acted as Hamlet, Richard III., and Sir Giles Overreach. In 1842 he married Miss Ellen Tree, a celebrated actress. From 1850 to 1859 he was manager of the Princess's theater. Died, 1868.

Keats, John, born in 1795; poet, son of a livery stable proprietor in Finsbury; was educated at a school at Enfield, where he formed a lifelong friendship with the master's son, Charles Cowden Clarke. He was apprenticed to Mr. Hammond, a surgeon at Edmonton, whom he left in 1812, but pursued his studies at Guy's Hospital till 1817. He then determined to follow the bent of his genius. "Endymion," his first long poem, appeared in 1818. "Isabella or the Pot of Basil," "Hyperion," "Lamia," "The Eve of St. Agnes," and the "Odes," were written in the course of the next two years. Meanwhile, an hereditary tendency to consumption had developed itself, and in September, 1820, he was forced to undertake a journey to Italy. He was accompanied by his friend, Joseph Severn, who nursed him tenderly during his last illness at Rome, where he died in February, 1821.

Keifer, Joseph Warren, ex-speaker United States Congress; born in Clark County, O., January 30, 1836; educated at Antioch College; since 1858 in law practice, Springfield, O.; served in Ohio volunteers in field, 1861-65; four times wounded; declined appointment as lieutenant-colonel 26th United States Infantry, 1866; member Ohio Senate, 1868-69; department commander Ohio G. A. R., 1868-70; vice-commander-in-chief G. A. R., 1871-72; delegate to Republican National Convention, 1876; member of Congress, 1877-85, and since 1905 (speaker, 1881-83); president of Lagonda National Bank, Springfield, O., since 1873. Appointed and served, 1898-99, as major-general volunteers in war against Spain. Author: "Slavery and Four Years of War."

Kellar, Harry, public entertainer (magician); born in Erie, Pa., July 11, 1849; graduated from Painesville, O., High School, 1866. When a young man was assistant to the "Fakir of Ava," the magician; joined Davenport Brothers, spirit mediums, as business manager, 1867; with Fay toured South America and Mexico as Fay & Kellar, 1871-73; with Ling Look and Yamadura, under name of Kellar, Ling Look & Yamadura, royal illusionists, played through South America, Africa, Australia, India, China, Philippine Islands, and Japan (Ling Look and Yamadura died in China, 1877); then with J. H. Cunard, as Kellar & Cunard, traveled five years through India, Burmah, Siam, Java, Persia, Asia Minor, Egypt, and Mediterranean ports; since 1884 has performed in leading American cities.

Kelly, Howard Atwood, physician; born in Camden, N. J., February 20, 1858; graduated from University of Pennsylvania, B. A., 1877, M. D., 1882; founder of Kensington Hospital, Philadelphia; associate professor of obstetrics, University of Pennsylvania, 1888-89; professor gynecology and obstetrics, Johns Hopkins University, 1889-99; professor of gynecology, Johns Hopkins University. Author: "Operative Gynecology" (two volumes), "The Vermiform Appendix and Its Diseases," also about 270 articles in medical journals.

Kembles, The, a celebrated family of actors. (1) John Philip, born in 1757; son of Roger Kemble, manager of a traveling company; was educated for the Roman Catholic priesthood. His first appearance in London was in the character of Hamlet at Drury Lane (1783). He was manager of Drury Lane 1788-1802, and part proprietor of Covent Garden, 1803-17. Died in 1823. (2) Sarah Kemble (Siddons). (3) Charles, born in 1775; educated at the college of Douay, appeared at Drury Lane in 1794 as Malcolm in Macbeth; in 1803 joined his brother and sister at Covent Garden, of which he was manager for a short time in 1817; visited the United States in 1832; retired from the stage in 1840. Died in 1854. (4) Frances Anna, born in 1811.

Kem'pis, Thomas a, born at Kempen, near Düsseldorf; son of a poor but honest and industrious craftsman named Hamerkin; joined, while yet a youth, the "Brotherhood of Common Life," at Deventer, in Holland, and at 20 entered the monastery of St. Agnes, near Zwolle, in Oberyssel, where he chiefly resided for seventy long years, and of which he became sub-prior, where he spent his time in acts of devotion and copying manuscripts, that of the Bible, among others, in the Vulgate version of it, as well as in the production of works of his own, and in chief the "Imitation of Christ," a work that in the regard of many, ranks second to the Bible, and is thought likely to survive in the literature of the world as long as the Bible itself; it has been translated into all languages within, as well as others outside, the pale of Christendom. Born, 1380; died, 1471.

Kent, James, an eminent American jurist; was born in Putnam County, N. Y., 1763. His most important work, "Commentaries on American Law," is a production of great literary merit, and a work of high authority in England as well as in the United States. Died, 1847.

Kepler, Johann, astronomer; born of poor parents at Württemberg, in 1571; studied at Tübingen under Mästlin; in 1593 became professor of astronomy at Gratz; in 1600 visited Tycho Brahé at Prague, became his assistant, and on his death (1601), was appointed mathematician to the Emperor Rodolph. He was afterwards professor at Linz, and finally at Rostock. He died in 1630, at Ratisbon. Two of Kepler's laws—that enunciating the elliptic form of the planetary orbits, and that of the "equable description of areas"—are contained in "Astronomia Nova." His third law, that the squares of the periodic times of the planets are as the cubes of their mean distances, is to be found in the "Harmonice Mundi."

Laurier, Sir Wilfrid, G. C. M. G., the first French-Canadian Premier of the Dominion, was born in St. Lin, 1841, and educated for the bar. Called in 1864, he rose rapidly in his profession, and in 1871 was elected as a liberal to the Quebec Provincial Assembly. In 1874 he was elected to the Federal Assembly, and his high personal character, his undoubted loyalty and attachment to the connection of the colony with Great Britain, together with his great oratorical powers, which have earned for him the title "Silver-tongued Laurier," soon gave him high rank in the Liberal party. On the retirement of Mr. Blake in 1891 he was chosen as leader of the Liberal party, and at the general election of 1896 he led his followers to a notable victory. His tariff legislation during 1897, giving Great Britain the benefit of preferential trade with Canada, aroused much enthusiasm both in the colony and at home, and he was warmly welcomed when he went to London to attend the Jubilee festivities. He was then appointed a member of the privy council and made a G. C. M. G. In 1900 he again secured the approval both of the dominion and of the empire by the prompt despatch of Canadian troops to aid the mother country in South Africa, and led his party to another victory at the polls in November. He attended the colonial conference and the coronation in England in 1902. He was again returned to power in 1904, and in 1907 attended the imperial conference in London.

Leopardi, Giacomo, modern Italian poet; born near Ancona, 1798; a precocious genius; an omnivorous reader as a boy, and devoted to literature; of a weakly constitution, he became a confirmed invalid, and died suddenly; had sceptical leanings; wrote lyrics inspired by a certain somber melancholy. Died, 1837.

Leopold I., King of the Belgians, son of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg; born in 1790; in his youth served in the Russian Army; visited England in 1815, and married Princess Charlotte, who died two years later; he declined the throne of Greece in 1830, but accepted that of the Belgians in 1831, and proved a wise, firm, constitutional sovereign; in 1832 he married the French Princess Louise; he was succeeded by his son Leopold II. Died, 1865.

Leopold II., born in 1835; son of the preceding; married the Archduchess Maria of Austria in 1853, and succeeded his father in 1865. His reign has been marked by the quarrels of the Liberals and Roman Catholics. He is the leading spirit of the International African Association.

Le Sage, Alain Rene, French novelist and dramatist; born in Sarzeau in Brittany, in 1668; educated in the Jesuit College at Vannes; went to Paris in 1692; learned Spanish, and translated or imitated several Spanish dramas; in 1707 produced "LeDiable Boiteux," and soon afterwards a comedy called "Turcaret." "Gil Blas" was published in three parts. Died, 1747.

Lesseps, Ferdinand, Vicomte de, born in 1805; after holding various consular posts, went to Madrid as ambassador in 1848. While in Egypt, in 1854, he proposed the scheme of the Suez canal to Said Pasha, and, a company having been formed, the canal was begun in 1859, and completed in 1869. He was also author of the Panama canal scheme. Died, 1894.

Lessing, Gotthold Ephraim, born in Kamenz, Lusatia, in 1729; educated at the Meissen Fürstenschule and the university of Leipzig; between 1749 and 1760 lived chiefly in Berlin, where Mendelssohn and Nicolai were his literary associates; was secretary to General Tauentzien, governor of Silesia, 1760-65; in 1770 became librarian to the Duke of Brunswick at Wolfenbüttel. By publishing Reimarus's "Wolfenbüttel Fragments," of which he was supposed to be the author, he incurred the hostility of the Church. His chief works are "Laokoon," a treatise on art, and the following dramas: "Miss Sarah Sampson," a tragedy; "Minna von Barnhelm," a comedy; "Emilia Galotti," a tragedy; and "Nathan der Weise." Died, 1781.

Lieber, Franz (lē'ber), born in Berlin, 1800; after suffering imprisonment for his political opinions, came to America (1827), and was made professor of history in Columbia College, South Carolina. He edited the "Encyclopædia Americana" (1829-33), and wrote "Political Ethics" (1838), "Civil Liberty and Self-Government" (1853), "Guerilla Parties" (1862), etc. Died, 1872.

Liebig, Justus (lē'big), Baron von, chemist, born in Darmstadt, 1803; studied at Bonn and Erlangen; went to Paris, and attracted the attention of Humboldt by a paper on fulminic acid; was appointed professor at Giessen (1824), where his laboratory became celebrated, and afterwards at Munich (1852). Among his chief works are "Organic Chemistry in its Application to Agriculture" (1840), and "Annalen der Chimie," edited in conjunction with Wöhler. Died, 1873.

Liliuokalani, Lydia Kamekeha, ex-queen of Hawaiian Islands; born in Honolulu, H. I., December 2, 1838; made vice-regent when King Kalakaua left Hawaii, and after his death in San Francisco was proclaimed queen, January 29, 1891. Her attempts to abolish the constitution of 1887 and restore absolute monarchy, though abandoned, led to her dethronement, January 30, 1892. A provisional government was set up, and although President Cleveland declared in favor of her restoration to the throne, her efforts in that direction failed. After her dethronement she came to the United States. Hawaii being annexed to United States, July, 1898, she returned to the islands in August, 1898.

Lincoln, Abraham, sixteenth President of the United States; born near Hodgenville, Kentucky, February 12, 1809. His father was a poor farmer, who, in 1816, removed from Kentucky to Indiana. In the rude life of the backwoods, Lincoln's entire schooling did not exceed one year, and he was employed in the severest agricultural labor. He lived with his family in Spencer County, Indiana, till 1830, when he removed to Illinois, where, with another man, he performed the feat of splitting 300 rails in a day, which gave him the popular sobriquet of "the Railsplitter." In 1834, he was elected to the Illinois Legislature. At this period, he lived by surveying land, wore patched homespun clothes, and spent his leisure hours in studying law. He was three times reelected to the legislature; was admitted to practice law in 1836; and removed to Springfield, the State capital. In 1844, he canvassed the State for Mr. Clay, then nominated for president. Mr. Clay was defeated, but the popularity gained by Lincoln in the canvass secured his own election to Congress in 1846, where he voted against the extension of slavery; and in 1854 was a recognized leader in the newly-formed Republican party. In 1855, he canvassed the State as a candidate for United States senator, against Mr. Douglas, but without success. In 1856, he was an active supporter of Mr. Fremont in the presidential canvass, which resulted in the election of Mr. Buchanan. In 1860, he was nominated for the presidency by the Chicago Convention over Mr. Seward, who expected the nomination. The non-extension of slavery to the Territories, or new States to be formed from them, was the most important principle of his party. There were three other candidates — Mr. Douglas of Illinois, Northern Democrat; Mr. Breckenridge of Kentucky, then vice-president, and afterwards a general of the Confederate army, Southern Democrat; and Mr. Bell of Tennessee, Native American. With this division, Mr. Lincoln received a majority of votes over any of the other candidates, though a million short of an absolute majority; every Southern and one Northern State voted against him. He was installed in the president's chair, March 4, 1861. His election by a sectional vote and on a sectional issue hostile to the South, was followed by the secession of eleven Southern States, and a war for the restoration of the Union. As a military measure, he proclaimed, January 1, 1863, the freedom of all slaves in the rebel States; and was reelected to the presidency in 1864. The war was practically brought to a close in April, 1865, through his efforts. On the 14th of the same month Lincoln was shot by an assassin, and died the next day. He was characterized by a strong sense of duty and great firmness. Died, 1865.

Lind, Jenny (Madame Otto Goldschmidt), the Swedish nightingale, was born at Stockholm in 1820. Giving evidence of her power of song in childhood, she was put under a master at 9; too soon put to practice in public, her voice at 12 showed signs of contracting, but after four years recovered its full power, when, appearing as Alice in "Robert le Diable," the effect was electric; henceforth her fame was established, and followed her over the world; in 1844 she made a round of the chief cities of Germany; made her first appearance in London in 1847, and visited New York in 1851, where she married, and then left the stage for good, to appear only now and again at intervals for some charitable object; She was plain looking; and a woman of great simplicity both in manners and ways of thinking. Died, 1887.

Linnaeus, or Carl von Linne (līn-nē'us or līn'nā'), was born at Rashult, in the province of Smaland, Sweden, May 24, 1707. He was the most eminent naturalist of his day, for many years professor of physic and of botany in the University of Upsala. He was the son of a clergyman, whose real name was Bengtsson, but who, before going into orders, had assumed the name of Linnaeus. He ascribed his love for the study of botany to his father, who was himself attached to the culture of his garden; but this love for the science was greatly developed during his residence, as a student, at the University of Lund, where a physician, who possessed a good library and a museum of natural history, received the young student into his house, and gave him every assistance and encouragement. In 1730, having received some further education at the University of Upsala, he became assistant and deputy to Rudbeck, then professor of botany in the university; and ten years later, having in the meantime traveled through Holland, France, England, and other countries, in pursuit of knowledge, he was himself appointed to the professorship at Upsala, which he held nominally till his death. He was the author of numerous works, of which the most important was "Systema Naturæ," which was first printed in 1735 in twelve folio pages, and grew by 1768 into three volumes. In 1757 he was raised to the rank of the nobility, and then took the name of Von Linné. Although his system of classification has long been to a large extent superseded, he undoubtedly prepared the way for other discoverers, and he did much to advance the study of natural science. His library and herbarium were purchased for the sum of one thousand pounds by Sir J. E. Smith, and were by him presented to the Linnæan Society of London, which was instituted in 1788, and incorporated in 1802, for the promotion of the science to which Linnaeus had devoted his life. Died at Upsala, 1778.

Lippi, Fra Filippo (lēp'pē), Italian painter, born in Florence, 1412; left an orphan, was brought up in a monastery, where his talent for art was developed and encouraged; went to Ancona, was carried off by pirates, but procured his release by his skill in drawing, and returning to Italy practiced his art in Florence and elsewhere, till one day he eloped with a novice in a nunnery who sat to him for a Madonna, by whom he became the father of a son no less famous than himself; he prosecuted his art amid poverty with zeal and success to the last; distinguished by Ruskin as the only monk who ever did good painter's work; he had Botticelli for a pupil. Died, 1469.

Liszt, Franz (Abbé) (līst), one of the most brilliant pianists who ever lived, was born October 22, 1811. He made his first appearance at a concert in his ninth year. He took orders and received the tonsure on April 25, 1865. In 1871 his native country of Hungary granted him a pension of £600 a year, and in 1875 he was named director of the Hungarian Academy of Music. One of his two daughters married Richard Wagner. Died, 1886.

Livingston, Edward, American lawyer and statesman, was born 1764; was elected to Congress in 1794; followed his profession at New Orleans (1804-23); represented that town in Congress (1823-9); entered the Senate (1829); became secretary of state (1831); was minister to France (1833-5). He wrote a celebrated "System of Penal Law" (1833). Died, 1836.

Livingstone, David, born at Blantyre, in Lanarkshire, 1813. He worked during childhood and youth in a cotton mill; was sent to South Africa by the London Missionary Society in 1840; resided for several years at various stations near the Limpopo, discovering Lake Ngami in 1849, and penetrating to the Makololo country in 1851; in 1853-4 crossed Africa from the Zambesi to the Congo, and in 1854-6 made his way from Loando to Quilimane, following the course of the Zambesi, and discovering the Victoria Falls; went to England in 1856, and published "Missionary Travels" (1857); returned to Africa as consul at Quilimane in 1858; explored the country north of the Zambesi (1858-64), discovering Lakes Shirwa and Nyassa, and in 1865 published his "Narrative" of the journey; undertook his third expedition in 1866, and spent the remainder of his life endeavoring to ascertain whether the Nile flowed from the water-system west of Lake Tanganyika. In November, 1871, he was found by Stanley at Ujiji. He died of dysentery at the village of Ilala, 1873.

Livy, or Titus Livius, was born at Patavium (Padua), in the north of Italy, 59 B. C. He was the most eminent of the Roman historians, distinguished for the animation of his narrative and for the purity of his style, though not for the reliableness of his historical statements. His "History of Rome" was written partly at Rome and partly at Naples, under the patronage of the Emperor Augustus. It consisted originally of 142 books; but of these only thirty-five have come down to us, and some of these in a very imperfect state. Of all but two, however, we possess fragments, with short epitomes from another hand. The "History" (or, as it was called by its author, "The Annals of the Roman People") begins with the foundation of the city, and ends with the death of Drusus, the younger brother of the Emperor Tiberius, 9 B. C. He died, 17 A. D.

Locke, John, an English philosopher; born in Wrington, in Somersetshire in 1632. He was educated at Westminster and Christ Church College, Oxford. When, in 1672, Lord Shaftesbury was appointed lord chancellor, he made Locke secretary of presentations, and at a later period, secretary to the Board of Trade. As a philosopher, Locke stands at the head of what is called the Sensational School in England. His greatest work is the "Essay on the Human Understanding," in which he endeavors to show that all our ideas are derived from experience, that is, through the senses, and reflection on what they reveal to us. He is best known to Americans as the author of a peculiar constitution for North Carolina, which included orders of nobility, etc. It was never put in operation. He died in 1704.

Lockwood, Belva Ann Bennett, lawyer; born in Royalton, N. Y., October, 24, 1830; daughter of Lewis Johnson and Hannah (Green) Bennett; graduate of Genesee College, Lima, N. Y., 1857 (A. M., Syracuse University, 1871); taught school, 1857-68. Worked for and secured passage by Congress of bill giving women employes of the government equal pay for equal work. Studied law in Washington; graduate of National University, B. L., 1873; admitted to District of Columbia bar; secured passage of a bill admitting women to United States Supreme Court, 1879; was admitted under it, February, 1879; also to United States Court of Claims; has been engaged in many important law cases, several before United States Supreme Court; for years identified with claims of North Carolina Cherokee Indians vs. United States; now has bill before Congress to remove intruders from Cherokee Nation; was one of attorneys in probate of will of Myra Clarke Gaines. Took a course of lectures, University Extension, in Oxford, England, 1890. Prominent in temperance, peace, and woman suffrage movements; nominated, 1884 and 1888, by Equal Rights Party for president of United States; commissioned by State Department to represent United States at Congress of Charities and Corrections, Geneva, Switzerland, 1896; one of committee appointed by Federation of Women's Clubs which secured law giving equal property rights for women and equal guardianship of their children in District of Columbia. Elected, January 18, 1901, president of Woman's National Press Association; president of District of Columbia Woman Suffrage Association; secretary of American branch international peace bureau; lecturer. Writer on peace and arbitration and on political and social subjects; has prepared amendments to Statehood bill before Congress, granting suffrage to women in Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico.

Long, John Luther, lawyer, author; born in Pennsylvania, 1861. Author: "Madam Butterfly," "Miss Cherry Blossom of Tôkyô," "The Fox-Woman," "The Prince of Illusion," "Naughty Nan," "Heimweh, and Other Stories."

Longfellow, Henry Wadsworth, an American poet; born in Portland, Maine, February 27, 1807; was graduated at Bowdoin College. While at college he distinguished himself in the study of modern languages, and published some short poems. In 1826 he accepted the professorship of modern languages at Bowdoin, being allowed three years to prepare himself for the post by study and travel in Europe. He was elected to the chair of modern languages and literature in Harvard University. After spending another year in Europe, studying Scandinavian languages and literature, he entered on his professorship in 1836. In 1839 he published "Hyperion, a Romance"; "Evangeline" in 1847; in 1855 "Hiawatha"; in 1858 the "Courtship of Miles Standish"; in 1863 "Tales of a Wayside Inn"; in 1871 the "Divine Tragedy"; in 1874 "The Hanging of the Crane." He resigned his chair at Harvard in 1854. In 1868-69 he again traveled in Europe, and received the degree of LL. D. and D. C. L., from the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford, respectively. His poems are equally popular on both sides of the Atlantic. He died in Cambridge, Mass., March 24, 1882.

Lorimer, George Horace, editor-in-chief of "Saturday Evening Post" since March 17, 1899; born in Louisville, Ky., October 6, 1868; educated at Mosely High School, Chicago; college course at Colby and Yale; Author: "Letters From a Self-Made Merchant to His Son," "Old Gorgon Graham."

Lotze, Rudolf Hermann (löt'se), a German philosopher; born in Bautzen, Saxony, May 21, 1817. He ranks among the first of metaphysicians, and has given impulse to the recent development of physiological psychology. Among his works are "Metaphysik" (1841), "Universal Pathology" (1842), "Logik" (1843), "On the Idea of Beauty" (1846), "Medical Psychology" (1852), "Microcosmus," "Ideas for a History of Nature," and "Humanity" (1856), "System of Philosophy" (1874-84). He died in Berlin, July 1, 1881.

Louis IX. was born in 1215 and succeeded his father, Louis VIII., in 1226, under the regency of his mother, Blanche of Castile. In 1229 the Albigensian crusade was brought to a close, and the county of Toulouse was incorporated with the French kingdom. Henry III. of England made some unsuccessful attempts to recover his lost provinces, and in 1259 yielded them to Louis. In 1248 Louis embarked on a crusade, wasted much time in Egypt (1248-50), where he was taken prisoner, and returned from Palestine in 1254 without having effected anything. He undertook another crusade in 1270, but died whilst besieging Tunis. He was canonized in 1297. Died, 1270.

Louis XII., son of Charles, Duke of Orleans, was born in 1462, and succeeded Charles VIII. in 1498. He laid claim to the kingdom of Naples and the duchy of Milan. In 1499 he invaded Italy, and gained possession of Milan. With the assistance of Ferdinand of Aragon, he conquered Naples in 1500, but, having quarreled with his ally, was expelled in 1503. In 1508 he united with Ferdinand, Pope Julius II., and the Emperor, in the League of Cambrai against the Venetians. In 1511 Ferdinand joined Julius in the Holy League against the French, who were finally driven out of Italy by means of the Swiss in 1513. In the same year Henry VIII. invaded France, and was successful at Guinegate. In 1499 Louis married Anne, Duchess of Brittany, widow of Charles VIII. By his good government he earned the title of "Father of his People." Died, 1515.

Louis XIV. was born 1638, and succeeded his father, Louis XIII., in 1643. His mother, Anne of Austria, was nominally regent, but the government was carried on by Cardinal Mazarin. France was then engaged in the Thirty Years' War, in which Truënne and Condé gained many successes. Peace was made in Germany by the Treaty of Westphalia (1648), but the war with Spain continued till 1659, when Louis married Maria Theresa, daughter of Philip IV. The unpopularity of Mazarin's government occasioned the rising of the Frondeurs (1648-53). After his death (1661) Louis conducted the government himself, following in financial matters the advice of his minister, Colbert. In 1665, he invaded the Netherlands, in violation of his agreement with Spain. In consequence of his attack on Holland (1672), an alliance against him was formed between Spain, the Emperor, and the Elector of Brandenburg, and a war ensued, which was terminated by the Treaty of Nimeguen (1678). The Edict of Nantes was revoked in 1685. Another war, undertaken to check the growing power of France, was concluded by the Peace of Ryswick (1697). In 1700 began the war of the Spanish Succession between the rival claimants, Philip, Duke of Anjou, Louis' grandson, and the Archduke Charles of Austria, who was supported by England and the Emperor. Died, 1715.

Louis XV., "le Bien-Aimé," was born 1710, and succeeded his great-grandfather, Louis XIV., in 1715, under the regency of Philip, Duke of Orleans, a nephew of Louis XIV. Fleury became chief minister in 1725. The King's attempt to enforce the claim of his father-in-law, Stanislas, to the throne of Poland, led to a war with the Emperor (1733-38). France was next engaged in the war of the Austrian Succession, Louis supporting the claim of Charles, Elector of Bavaria (1741-48). During the Seven Years' War (1756-63) France was deprived by England of most of her colonial possessions. Died, 1774.

Louis XVI. was born in 1754, and succeeded his father, Louis XV., in 1774. In 1770 he had married Marie Antoinette, daughter of Maria Theresa of Austria. The finances were in complete disorder, and Louis was not fortunate in his choice of ministers. Turgot and Necker were in turn dismissed, and succeeded by the incapable Calonne (1783-87) and Loménie de Brienne (1787-88). Necker was recalled, and advised the summoning of the States-General (May, 1789), who were reconstituted as the National Assembly. The dismissal of Necker was followed by the taking of the Bastille (July 14th). In October a mob of armed women from Paris made an attack on the palace of Versailles, after which the king and queen were forcibly removed to Paris. In 1789 the States-General of the kingdom were convoked at Versailles. This body, which had always been formidable to monarchical authority, had not been convoked since 1614. Within a few days it was superseded by the National Assembly, which assumed the whole legislative authority; and then began the revolution, which culminated (so far as the king was concerned) in the insurrection of June, 1792, and in his execution on the scaffold in January of the following year. Died, 1793.

Louis Philippe I. (-fe-leep'), born in Paris, 1773, was the eldest son of Louis Philippe, Duc d'Orleans, commonly known as "Philippe Egalité." While still young he was educated in opinions of advanced political liberalism, and served in the revolutionary army against the Austrians, 1792, under Dumouriez, in whose conspiracy he became involved. After an exile of many years, during which he resided in many countries (the United States among others) and underwent singular vicissitudes, this prince shared in the restoration of his house, 1814; and, after the fall of the elder Bourbon dynasty in 1830, was popularly elected to the vacant throne, under the title of "King of the French." Louis cultivated peaceful relations with foreign powers, sought to strengthen his throne by gaining the support of the middle classes, and repressed all the extreme parties by what became known as the "Juste-milieu" policy. The extreme democrats hated him, and frequent attempts were made upon his life. The country prospered under his government, but a demand for reform in the electoral system became loud and general, and this being unwisely opposed by the king and his minister Guizot, led to the revolution of 1848, when Louis Philippe, deserted by all, fled with his queen to England, where he died, 1850.

Low, Seth, an American educator; born in Brooklyn, N. Y., January 18, 1850; was graduated at Columbia University in 1870; made a member of his father's mercantile firm in 1875; mayor of Brooklyn in 1881-1885; and was elected president of Columbia University in 1890. In 1895, he erected for that institution a grand university library at a cost of $1,175,000. In honor of president Low's generosity and in accord with his desire, the trustees of Columbia founded twelve scholarships in the university for Brooklyn boys and the same number in Barnard College for Brooklyn girls, and also agreed to found eight annual scholarships. In 1899, he was appointed by President McKinley a member of the delegation to represent the United States at the International Peace Conference at The Hague. Mr. Low was an unsuccessful candidate for mayor of Greater New York in 1897; and was again nominated for the office on a fusion ticket in 1901. He was elected after a hard-fought campaign, and was again candidate on the fusion ticket in the autumn of 1903, and defeated.

Lowell, Abbott Lawrence, born in Boston, December 13, 1856; graduated from Harvard in 1877, and from Harvard Law School in 1880; practiced law in Boston, 1880-97; acted as lecturer at Harvard, 1897-99, and was professor of the science of government from 1900. In the same year he became a trustee of the Lowell Institute of Boston. He is known as an authority in the field of comparative politics, and is the author of "Essays on Government," "Governments and Parties in Continental Europe," "Colonial Civil Service" (with Prof. H. Morse Stephens), "The Influence of Party upon Legislation in England and America," and other works. In January, 1909, upon the resignation of Dr. Eliot, he was elected president of Harvard University.

Lowell, James Russell, an American poet, was born in Boston in 1819. He was educated at Harvard University. His "Legend of Brittany" appeared in 1844. In 1845, he published a prose work entitled "Conversations on Some of the Old Poets." His "Fable for Critics," and "The Biglow Papers," are racy with humor. In 1854, he succeeded Longfellow as professor of modern languages at Harvard; from 1857 to 1862, was editor of the "Atlantic Monthly," and from 1863 to 1872, of the "North American Review." He received the degree of LL. D. from the English University of Cambridge in 1874. Was Minister to Great Britain 1880-85. In 1869, he published "Under the Willows, and Other Poems"; and "The Cathedral," an epic; in 1870, a collection of essays; in 1871, "My Study Windows"; in 1886, "Democracy"; in 1888, "Political Essays." He died in Cambridge, 1891.

Loyola, Ignatius de (lō-yō'lah), was born at Loyola, in the Basque Provinces, 1491. He was an ecclesiastic of the Roman Catholic Church, the founder of the order of Jesuits, or "the Society of Jesus." He was the son of a Spanish nobleman (Bertram de Loyola), and was early devoted to the profession of arms; but, being wounded at the siege of Pampeluna, in Navarre, in 1521, he devoted his life to the service of the Virgin, made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and founded the Society of Jesus on his return to Paris, in 1534. The institution of the society was confirmed by a bull of Pope Paul III., September 27, 1540; and in the following year Loyola was appointed the first General of the order. He was canonized by Pope Gregory XV. in 1622. Died in Rome, 1556.

Lubbock, Sir John, born in 1834; entered parliament as a liberal in 1870; in 1871 passed the bank holidays act; has represented London University since 1880. He has published "Pre-Historic Times," "Ants, Bees, and Wasps," "The Pleasures of Life," etc.

Lucretius, Titus Carus, Roman poet of the First Century B. C.; wrote "De Rerum Natura," in hexameter verse, expounding the epicurean system of philosophy. He is said to have been driven mad by a love philtre, administered by his wife, and to have committed suicide.

Luke, St., one of the four Evangelists, was the associate of St. Paul in his mission of evangelizing the Gentiles. The time and place of his nativity are not known with any approach to authenticity, though it would appear from the style and substance of his writings that he must have received a liberal scholarship. Besides the Gospel called after him, he was author of "The Acts of the Apostles," written, like the former, in Greek.

Luther, Martin, one of the greatest of religious leaders, was born in Eisleben, Germany, 1483. After studying at the University of Erfurt, he became a monk of the Augustine order in that city, and, in 1507, was made professor of philosophy at Wittenberg. After a visit to Rome, in pursuance of a vow he had made, his ideas regarding the tenets and practices of the Roman Church underwent a gradual change. In 1512, he began openly to declare his heterodox views upon scriptural theology. These views, embodied in his celebrated "ninety-five propositions," at once plunged him into bitter controversy and exposed him to as bitter persecution. He soon found friends, however, among some of the most powerful of the German princes. Summoned by the pope to defend his opinions, through the intervention of the Elector of Saxony, it was arranged that a hearing should be given to Luther at Augsburg, before the papal legate. That interview was held, and it decided nothing. Luther then continued his public discussions, and also gave vent to his polemic innovations in writings — one of which, the "De Captivitate Babylonicâ Ecclesiæ," created so great a sensation that a papal bull was issued, condemning to a public auto-da-fé it and others of his productions. Luther, however, finding that the crisis had come, proceeded to the walls of Wittenberg, attended by a number of his friends and disciples, there burned the pope's bull, and by that act dis severed forever his remaining ties with the Church of Rome. After this Luther became the spokesman of a propaganda whose labors never rested till the spirit of the Protestant religion had taken deep and lasting root throughout Northern Germany, and thence extended among her Scandinavian neighbors. Cited to appear before the Diet of Worms, 1521, Luther appeared there, attended by a retinue of the Protestant princes and the nobles of Germany, and after ably pleading his cause — that of religious liberty — before the Emperor Charles V. in person, he was seized, on his returning home, at the instigation of his friend, the Elector of Saxony, and carried to the castle of Wartburg, where he remained for a period of ten months. Returning then to Wittenberg, he doffed his morastic character, married, published his translation of the New Testament in 1522, and his German version of the Old Testament in 1534. The closing years of the life of Luther were passed in comparative tranquillity. Died, 1546.

Lyell, Sir Charles, geologist, was born in Forfarshire in 1797; educated at Oxford; was called to the bar in 1825, but abandoned the legal profession in 1827; after traveling on the Continent, and contributing papers to the "Transactions" of the Geological Society, published "Principles of Geology" (1830-33), which substituted the Huttonian doctrines for the old "catastrophic" theory, thus raising geology to the rank of a branch of inductive science. He became president of the Geological Society in 1836, and again in 1850. He visited America in 1841 and 1845, and published narratives of both expeditions, written in a popular style. In 1863 appeared "The Antiquity of Man," in which he gave his assent to the Darwinian theory. Died, 1875.

Lytton, Edward George Earle Lytton Bulwer-Lytton, Lord, an eminent English novelist, was born in Norfolk, of an ancient family, in 1803. In 1826, he graduated at Cambridge, and published, in 1827, his first novel, "Falkland." In the year following "Pelham" appeared — a work which placed him at once in the first rank of contemporary writers of fiction. Thenceforward his literary career was one of meteoric brilliancy; novel after novel, drama after drama, flowed from his pen almost without intermission. For a quarter of a century he reigned the great master of English fiction — the successor to Scott, the predecessor of Dickens. In 1866 he was created a peer of the realm. Among his principal novels are: "The Disowned," "Devereux," "Paul Clifford," "Eugene Aram," "The Pilgrims of the Rhine,"

"The Last Days of Pompeii," "Rienzi," "The Last of the Roman Tribunes," "Ernest Maltravers," and its sequel, "Alice, or the Mysteries," "Night and Morning," "Zanoni," "The Last of the Barons," "Lucretia, or the Children of the Night," "Harold, the Last of the Saxon Kings," "The Caxtons," "My Novel," "What Will He Do With It," and "A Strange Story." He is also author of the successful and favorite plays "The Lady of Lyons," "Richelieu," and "Money," and of the poems, "The New Timon," and "King Arthur." Died, 1873.

Macaulay, Thomas Babington, Lord, born in 1800; British historian and statesman; graduated at Cambridge, was called to the bar in 1826, and entered parliament for Calne in 1830, as a Whig. He was secretary at war (1839-41), and paymaster-general (1846-48), and, having represented Edinburgh for many years, was created a peer in 1857. His chief works were "History of England from the Accession of James II.," "Critical Essays," most of which were written for the "Edinburgh Review," and "Lays of Ancient Rome." Died, 1859.

Macchiavelli, Niccolo di Bernardo dei, born in 1469; Florentine writer and statesman; son of a jurist of good family; as secretary of state at Florence from 1498 to 1512, went on several important missions, but was deprived and exiled in the latter year by the Medici. His chief works were "Il Principe," "Istorie Fiorentine," "Arte della Guerra," some comedies and poems, and "Discorsi sulle Deche di Tito Livio." In 1521, he again took part in affairs for a short time, but died in poverty, in 1527, a few years later.

Macdonald, Sir John Alexander, distinguished Canadian statesman: born in Glasgow in 1815; was called to the Canadian bar in 1836, and became receiver-general of Canada (1847), commissioner of crown lands (1847-48), attorney-general (1854-62 and 1864-67), prime minister in 1858, government leader in the assembly (1864-67), and minister of militia affairs (1862-65-67). He was chairman of the London Colonial Conference of 1866-67, and more than any other person was responsible for Canadian federation; was head of the new Dominion Government, as minister of justice and attorney-general, from 1867 to 1873, when he resigned on the Pacific Railway charges. From 1878 till his death in 1891, he was premier of the Dominion.

Mackenzie, Alexander, Canadian statesman; born in Perthshire, 1822; early emigrated to Canada, where he became a contractor and journalist. After sitting in the Canadian Parliament for six years, he was elected to the Dominion Legislature, and was also provincial secretary and treasurer in Ontario till 1872. From 1873 till 1878 he was premier and minister of public works for the Dominion. He more than once declined the honor of knighthood. Died, 1892.

MacMahon, Marie Edme Patrice Maurice de, French soldier and statesman of Irish descent; born, 1808; served in the Algerian War of 1830, took part in the expedition to Antwerp in 1832, and in 1855, succeeded to Canrobert's command in the Crimea. For his services in Italy in 1857, he was made Duc de Magenta and marshal of France, and became governor-general of Algeria in 1864. On the outbreak of war with Prussia he was given the command of the first army corps. He shared in the disaster at Woerth, and was in chief command at Sedan, where he was severely wounded and made prisoner. On his return to France in March, 1871, he conducted the siege of Paris against the Communists, and reorganized the army. In 1873, he was named president of the Republic for seven years. In 1877, he began to entertain monarchical designs, but was defeated in the elections, and two years later retired rather than submit to the law against monarchical officers. He continued to live in retirement in Paris until his death in 1893.

Macready, William Charles, actor; born in London, in 1793; educated at Rugby; made his first appearance at Birmingham in 1810, and was engaged at Covent Garden in 1816. He played Richard III. in 1819, and removed to Drury Lane in 1822, and after a tour in the United States, appeared as Macbeth in 1827. He subsequently visited Paris, and held the management of Covent Garden and Drury Lane. In 1849, he nearly lost his life in a riot promoted by the friends of Forrest at the Astor Opera House, New York; and he made his last appearance at Drury Lane in 1851. Died, 1873.

Mac Veagh, Wayne, lawyer; born near Phoenixville, Chester County, Pa., April 19, 1833; graduated from Yale, 1853; admitted to bar, 1856; district attorney, Chester County, Pa., 1859-64; captain of infantry, 1862, and of cavalry, 1863, when invasions of Pennsylvania were threatened; chairman Republican State Committee of Pennsylvania, 1863; United States minister to Turkey, 1870-71; member Pennsylvania constitutional convention, 1872-74; head of "Mac-Veagh commission" sent to Louisiana, 1877, by President Hayes to amicably adjust disputes of contending parties there; United States attorney-general in cabinet of President Garfield, 1881, but resigned on accession of President Arthur, resuming law practice at Philadelphia; supported Cleveland for president, 1892; ambassador to Italy, 1893-97; chief counsel of United States in the Venezuelan arbitration before The Hague Tribunal, 1903.

Madison, James, fourth President of the United States; was born in King George, Virginia, March 16, 1751. He graduated at Princeton, N. J., in 1771, and studied law. In 1776, he was a member of the Virginia Convention, and, though too modest for an orator, he became one of the most eminent, accomplished, and respected of American statesmen. He was elected to the Federal Congress in 1779: in 1784, to the Legislature of Virginia, in which he supported the measures of Mr. Jefferson in the revision of the laws, and placing all religious denominations on an equality of freedom without State support. As a member of the convention of 1787, which framed the Federal Constitution, Mr. Madison acted with Jay and Hamilton, and with them wrote the "Federalist." He supported the adoption of the constitution, but opposed the financial policy of Hamilton, and became a leader of the Republican or Jeffersonian party. He declined the mission to France, and the office of secretary of state, but in 1792 became the leader of the Republican party in Congress, and wrote the Kentucky Resolutions of 1798, which contain the basis of the State-rights doctrines. In 1801, Mr. Jefferson having been elected president, Mr. Madison was made secretary of state, which post he held during the eight years of his administration. In 1809, he was elected president. The European wars of that period, with their blockades and orders in council, were destructive of American commerce. The claim of the English Government to impress seamen from American vessels was violently resisted. Mr. Madison vainly endeavored to avoid a war with England, which was declared in 1812, and continued for two years, at a cost of 30,000 lives and 100,000,000 dollars. He was one of the four presidents elected for a second term, during which he approved the establishment of a national bank as a financial necessity—a measure he had opposed and vetoed. In 1817, he retired to his seat at Montpelier, Virginia, where he served as a rector of the University of Virginia, and a promoter of agriculture and public improvements. Without being a brilliant man, he was a statesman of eminent ability and purity of character. He died at Montpelier, January 28, 1836.

Maeterlinck, Maurice, Belgian author; was born in 1864. The following is a list of his works, some of which have been translated into English and have attracted considerable attention: "La Princesse Maleine," "Pelléas et Mélisande," "Alladine et Palomides," "Ag-lavaine et Selysette," "Douze Chansons," "Le Trésor des Humbles," "La Mort de Tintagiles," "L'Intruse," and "La Sagesse et la Destinée." He is also the author of the dramas "Ariane et Barbebleue" and "Sœur Béatrice," "Monna Vanna," and of "Joyzelle."

Magdalene, Mary, a Galilean, belonging to Magdala, on the sea of Galilee, who followed Christ, stood by the cross, prepared spices for His sepulchre, to whom He first appeared after His resurrection, and who is supposed by some recent critics to be the sole voucher for His rising again.

Magellan, Ferdinand, Portuguese navigator; born, 1480; served his country first in the East Indies and Morocco, but dissatisfied with King Manuel's treatment of him, offered himself to Spain; under Charles V.'s patronage he and Ruy Falero set out to reach the Moluccas by the west in 1519; he reached the Philippines, and died in battle in Matan; on this voyage he discovered the Magellan Strait, 375 miles long and fifteen miles wide, between the South American mainland and Tierra del Fuego; he gave name to the Pacific from the exceptional calm he, it appears, experienced on entering it. Died, 1521.

Magoon, Charles E., lawyer, administrator; born in Minnesota, December 5, 1861; educated at high school, Owatonna, Minn., University of Nebraska; admitted to bar, 1882, and engaged in general practice; was judge advocate of Nebraska National Guard; law officer of Bureau of Insular Affairs, War Department, Washington, 1899-1904; general counsel, Isthmian Canal commission, 1904-05; governor Canal Zone, 1905-06; American minister to Panama 1905-06; 1906-1909, provisional governor of Cuba. Author: "The Law of Civil Government Under Military Occupation."

Mahan, Alfred Thayer (Ma-han'), an American naval officer and writer; born in West Point, N. Y., September 27, 1840; was graduated at the United States Naval Academy in 1859; served in the Civil War; was president of the Naval War College, Newport, in 1886-89 and 1890-93; visited Europe in command of the "Chicago" in 1893, receiving many honors, among them degrees from both Oxford and Cambridge. He was retired at his own request November 17, 1896. During the war with Spain he was a member of the Naval Board of Strategy; and in 1899 was appointed by President McKinley as one of the American delegates to the Universal Peace Conference at The Hague. His chief work, "Influence of Sea Power upon History," with its continuation, "Influence of Sea Power upon the French Revolution and Empire," gave him a world-wide reputation.

Maine, Sir Henry Sumner, F. R. S., D. C. L., born in 1822; English jurist, educated at Cambridge, where in 1847, he became Regius professor of civil law. After being reader at the Temple, he was law member of the council of India for seven years, and in 1870, became Corpus professor at Oxford. His chief works were "Ancient Law," "Village Communities," and "Early History of Institutions," etc. In 1871 he became member of the secretary of state for India's council, and in 1877 master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge. Died, 1888.

Malibran de Beust, Maria Felicita, born in 1808; French singer, daughter of Manuel Garcia; made her début in the Italian opera in 1825, and soon afterwards married her first husband, from whom she was divorced in 1836, her second being De Beriot, the violinist. She met with much success in "Semiramis," and other operas, making tours in England, the Continent, and the United States. She died from the consequence of a fall while riding. Died, 1836.

Malory, Sir Thomas, flourished in the Fifteenth Century; was the author of "Morte d'Arthur," being a translation in prose of a labyrinthine selection of Arthurian legends, which was finished in the ninth year of Edward IV., and printed fifteen years after by Caxton "with all care."

Malpighi, Marcello, born in 1628; Italian anatomist and chief physician to Pope Innocent XI.; lectured in Bologna, Pisa, and other places, and wrote works on the anatomy of plants, the physiology of the silkworm, and medical subjects. His name was given to the Malpighian genus. Died, 1694.

Malthus, Thomas Robert, F. R. S., born in 1766; English political economist; some time Fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge; published in 1798 his "Essay on Population," afterwards took orders, and held from 1804 the professorship of history and political economy in the East India Company's college, Haileybury. Died, 1834.

Mann, Horace, an American statesman; born in Franklin, Mass., 1796; is chiefly remembered for his untiring efforts in the cause of educational extension and reform, in the suppression of slavery, and in the promotion of temperance. Died, 1859.

Emmett, etc.; then "barn-stormed" in classical drama; played Utterson, the lawyer, in Daniel Bandmann's production of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde"; appeared in one of leading rôles in "Incog"; subsequently was original caricaturist of Svengali in "Merry World"; created German comedy parts in "The Strange Adventures of Miss Brown," and in "Girl from Paris"; has since been one of the leading impersonators of these and character rôles; starred five years jointly with Clara Lipman, his wife. Author of short stories.

Mannerling, Mary, actress; born in London, England, April 29, 1878; daughter of Richard and Florence Friend (stage name taken from maiden name of her father's grandmother); educated at private schools; studied for stage under Herman Vezin; went on stage at 15; appeared in "Hero and Leander" at Shaftesbury Theater, London; toured English provinces two years, playing Shakesperian rôles; then leading parts in "Sowing the Wind"; "The Late Mr. Costello," "Called Back" (revised for English provinces); etc.; came to United States under management of Daniel Frohman; American début at Parsons' Theater, Hartford, Conn.; November 20, 1896, in "The Courtship of Leoni"; New York début, Lyceum Theater, four days later; has since appeared in leading rôles in modern drama; married, May 2, 1897, J. K. Hackett.

Manning, Henry Edward, Cardinal, born in 1808; English Roman Catholic prelate, educated at Harrow and Balliol; was some time Fellow of Merton; subsequently took orders, and became Archdeacon of Chichester in 1840. In 1851, however, he seceded to the Roman Church, publishing "Grounds of Faith" next year. In 1865 he succeeded Wiseman as Archbishop of Westminster, and ten years later was made cardinal. He approved the infallibility dogma of the Vatican Council of 1869, and carried on a controversy with Mr. Gladstone on the subject. He sat on several commissions, and took a leading part in bringing to a conclusion the dock strike of 1889. Died in 1892.

Mansel, Henry Longueville, born in 1820; English philosopher and theologian; one of the strongest opponents of the Broad Church school; was educated at Merchant Taylors and Oxford, where he was successively Waynflete professor of moral philosophy and professor of ecclesiastical history, and in 1858, delivered the Bampton lectures on "The Limits of Religious Thought." He had previously published an edition of Aldrich's "Logic," and several works on metaphysics. His appointment to the deanery of St. Paul's, in 1869, was strongly opposed. Died, 1871.

Mansfield, Richard, actor, was born in Heligoland, Germany, in 1857; studied for East Indian civil service, but came to Boston and opened a studio; studied art in England and later entered theatrical profession. Played small parts in comic opera; came to United States again and appeared at Standard Theater, New York, as Dromez in "Les Manteaux Noirs." Was very successful in a wide repertoire from Koko in Mikado to Richard III. Head of his own company, and has created such parts as Beau Brummel, Baron Cheyrial, and the titular rôles in "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde." Appeared as Cyrano de Bergerac in 1899, and has played Shylock, Henry V., Beaucaire and Brutus in Julius Cæsar. Married Beatrice Cameron, his leading woman. Author: "Blown Away," "Monsieur," "Ten Thousand a Year," and "Don Juan." Died, 1907.

Mansfield, William Murray, Earl of, was born at Perth, March 2, 1704. He was a distinguished judge, from 1756 to 1788 chief justice of the King's Bench. He was remarkable for his accomplishments and for his eloquence, and was styled by Pope "the silver-tongued Murray"; but his political opinions were not popular, and, in the Gordon riots of 1780, his house in Bloomsbury Square, London, was burnt down by the mob. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. Died, 1793.

Mantell, Robert Bruce, actor; born in Irvine, Ayrshire, Scotland, February 7, 1854; professional début, Rochdale, England, as the Sergeant in "Arrah-na-Pogue," October 21, 1876; came to United States and played juvenile rôles with Mme. Modjeska, 1878; returned to England, and for three years supported Miss Wallis (now Mrs. Lancaster) as leading man. Later appeared in New York as Loris Ippanhoff in "Fedora," with Fanny Davenport; afterward became a star, and has been at the head of his own company in classic and romantic plays, including "Hamlet," "Othello," "Richard III.," "Macbeth," "Romeo and Juliet," "Riche-lieu," "Lady of Lyons," "Corsican Brothers," "Mon-bars," "Dagger and Cross," etc.

Marat, Jean Paul (mah-rah'), a fanatical democrat, born in Neuchâtel, 1744. His father was an Italian, his mother a Genevese; studied and practiced medicine, went to Paris as horse-leech to Count d'Artois; became infected with the revolutionary fever, and had one fixed idea: "Give me," he said, "two hundred Naples braves, armed each with a good dirk, and a muff on his left arm by way of shield, and with them I will traverse France and accomplish the Revolution," that is, by wholesale massacre of the aristocrats; he had more than once to flee for his life, and one time found shelter in the sewers of Paris, contracting thereby a loathsome skin disease; he was assassinated one evening as he sat in his bath, by Charlotte Corday, but his body was buried with honors in the Pantheon by a patriot people, "that of Mirabeau flung out to make room for him," to be some few months after himself cast out with execration. Died, 1793.

March, Francis Andrew, American philologist; born in Milbury, Mass., in 1825; was made professor of English language and comparative philology at Lafayette College, Pennsylvania, in 1857; became president of the American Philological Association in 1873, and took the direction in America of Dr. Murray's "New English Dictionary on Historical Principles," in 1879. His chief works are "Method of Philological Study of the English Language," "Comparative Grammar of Anglo-Saxon," and "Introduction to Anglo-Saxon."

Marconi, Guglielmo, LL. D., D. Sc., electrical engineer and pioneer of wireless telegraphy, was born in Griffone, near Bologna, in 1874. His father was an Italian, his mother an Irishwoman. He was educated at Leghorn and Bologna Universities. It was at Bologna that his system of wireless telegraphy first attracted attention. In 1896, he visited England, and, with his invention, sent messages across the Bristol Channel from Penarth, near Cardiff, to Weston-super-

Mare. He afterwards set up installations of wireless telegraphy between the South Foreland and the East Godwin light-vessel, the South Foreland and Wimeroux in France, Harwich and Chelmsford. His system was definitely adopted by the Admiralty in 1900. In December, 1901, Mr. Marconi succeeded in communicating across the Atlantic Ocean. In 1902, he set up a station at Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, and in October, 1907, began a public service of wireless telegraphy across the Atlantic.

Marcy, William Learned, American statesman, born at Southbridge, Mass., in 1786; died, July 4, 1857. He graduated at Brown University in 1808, studied law, and practiced in Troy, N. Y. He was an associate justice of the New York supreme court from 1829 to 1831, when he was elected United States senator. He was elected governor of New York in 1832, 1834, and 1836. President Van Buren appointed him member of the Mexican Claims Commission, in 1839. In 1845, President Polk appointed him secretary of war; and he was secretary of state in President Pierce's cabinet, 1853-57. He left a reputation as a statesman of the highest order of abilities.

Margaret of Austria, born in 1480; daughter of the Emperor Maximilian and Mary of Burgundy; married first John of Castile, and secondly Philibert of Savoy; was made governor of the Low Countries in 1507, and negotiated both the League of Cambrai (1508) and the "Paix des Dames" (1529). Died, 1530.

Margaret of Denmark, born in 1353; succeeded her father, Waldemar III., became queen also of Norway on the death of her husband, Haco VIII., but was soon expelled; recovered Norway in 1387, and, having defeated Albert of Mecklenburg in 1389, united the three Scandinavian kingdoms by the union of Colmar in 1397. Died, 1412.

Margaret of Valois, born in 1492; sister of Francis I. and grandmother of Henri IV.; married first the Duc d'Alençon, and secondly Henri d'Albret, titular King of Navarre; supported the Reformation, and wrote "Miroir de l'Âme Pécheresse," and "Contes et Nouvelles" (the "Heptameron"). Died, 1549.

Maria Theresa, born in 1717; Queen of Hungary, and daughter of the Emperor Charles VI.; married Francis of Lorraine in 1735, and was supported by England against the Elector of Bavaria, who claimed the empire, and was supported by France; carried on the Seven Years' War, with the help of France, against Prussia, who had obtained part of Silesia; took part, against her will, in the first partition of Poland. Died, 1780.

Marie de' Medici, born in 1573; Queen of France, daughter of Francis of Tuscany; married Henri IV. in 1600, and became mother of Louis XIII., during whose minority she was regent, but was overthrown by Richelieu after a long contest, and left France in 1630. Died, 1642.

Mario, Giuseppe, a famous Italian opera-singer, was born at Cagliari, Italy, in 1812, and was the son of General di Candia. In 1838, he made his first appearance in opera as "Robert," in "Robert le Diable." In this he achieved the first of many successes in Paris, London, St. Petersburg, and America. Mario married the famous singer Giulia Grisi, and retired from the stage in 1867. He died December 11, 1883.

Mark, the Evangelist. "John, whose surname was Mark," was the son of Mary, a woman of piety who lived in Jerusalem, where the disciples occasionally assembled at her house for prayer, and was sister to Barnabas. He is also called Marcus. He accompanied the Apostle Paul and Barnabas to Antioch, Cyprus, and Perga in Pamphylia, returned to Jerusalem, and went afterwards to Cyprus, and thence to Rome. Ecclesiastical tradition speaks of a missionary expedition of Mark to Egypt and the west of Africa, of his suffering martyrdom about the year 62 or 66 (the Coptic Church still consider him their founder and first bishop), and of the transmission of his corpse to Venice, which city has chosen him for its patron saint. It is said that he wrote at Rome the gospel which bears his name.

Mark Antony, or Marcus Antonius, an eminent Roman, was born about 83 B. C. He was one of the most active partisans of Julius Cæsar down to the death of the latter. After the death of Cæsar, he endeavored to succeed to power, but was defeated by Octavianus, the great-nephew of the dictator, and was obliged to cross the Alps. He afterwards became reconciled to Octavianus; and Antony, Octavianus, and Lepidus divided the government between them under the title of Triumvirs. Cicero, who had attacked Antony in his Philippic orations, now fell a victim to Antony. Antony afterwards went to Asia, which he had received as his share of the Roman world, and there the greater part of his remaining life was spent. There he became captivated by the charms of Cleopatra, and assumed the pomp and ceremony of an Eastern despot. After the sea-fight off Actium (September 2, 31), he fled with Cleopatra to Alexandria, and put an end to his life in the following year, when Octavianus (Augustus) appeared before the city. Died, 30 B. C.

Marlborough, John Churchill, first Duke of; born in 1650; soldier and diplomatist; obtained a commission through the influence of his sister with the Duke of York, and first served under Turenne; deserted James II. at the Revolution, but, though created earl and commander-in-chief by William III., intrigued with his former master; after a period of disgrace, went to The Hague to organize the Grand Alliance; was appointed captain-general and duke under Anne, and won the victories of Blenheim (1704), Ramillies (1706), Oudenarde (1708), and Malplaquet (1709), but was recalled in 1710, and dismissed on a charge of peculation. He was restored by George I. in 1714, but never fully trusted. Died, 1722.

Marlowe, Julia, actress; born in England, in village of Caldbeck, Cumberlandshire, August 17, 1870; came, at age of 5, to United States with parents; lived in Kansas two years; moved to Ohio, locating finally in Cincinnati; attended public schools until 12th year; then joined juvenile opera company, which gave "Pinafore," "Chimes of Normandy," and other light operas. Was christened Sarah Frances Frost, but in the juvenile company was called Frances Brough (the latter a family name); later played a child's part in "Rip Van Winkle," and, the next season, played small parts in a company which gave classic dramas in the West; retired from stage and studied three years in New York; made metropolitan debut as Parthenia in "Ingomar"; since November, 1888, has starred in Shakespearian and other tragic and romantic rôles in United States; married Robert Taber, who had been leading man in her company, but afterward secured legal separation.

Marshall, John, an eminent American jurist, was born in Fauquier County, Va., in 1755. He served in several battles of the Revolution, afterwards entered upon the study and practice of the law, and, in 1788, became a member of the convention of his native State, where he took an active part in promoting the settlement of its constitution, and supported the Federalist party. In 1797, he was a colleague of Mr. Gerry and General Pinckney on a special mission to the French Directory; in 1799, entered Congress, and there highly distinguished himself. In the following year he entered upon the duties of secretary of state, and, in 1801, was appointed to the chief-justiceship of the Supreme Court of the United States, a position he filled with high honor to himself and his decisions during the long period of thirty-four years. Marshall was a statesman of the first order. Died, 1835.

Martineau, Harriet, born in 1802; English writer of Huguenot descent, daughter of a Norwich surgeon; visited the United States in 1834, and the East in 1846, publishing descriptive works on her return; wrote "Deerbrook," "The Hour and the Man," and other novels, and many tales for children, and was also author of a condensation of Comte, and "History of England During the Thirty Years' Peace." Died, 1876.

Martineau, James, born in 1805; theologian, brother of the last-named; educated at Norwich and Manchester New College, York; after being minister at Little Portland Street Unitarian Chapel for more than twelve years, became principal of Manchester New College, London, in 1869. His chief works are "Essays, Philosophical and Theological," "The Relation Between Ethics and Religion," "Types of Ethical Theory," "A Study of Religion," and "The Seat of Authority in Religion." Died, 1900.

Marx, Karl, German Socialist; born in 1818, in Trèves, where his father was a lawyer; educated at Bonn and Berlin; took an active part in the Liberal movement of 1840, and, after the suppression of the "Rhenish Gazette" (edited by him), he went to Paris, but had to leave it for Brussels on the demand of the Prussian Government. Having been expelled from Belgium, he was invited to Paris, but soon went to Cologne, where he attempted to revive the "Rhenish Gazette." He now settled in London, where he was engaged in literary work, and took an active part in the International Working Men's Association. After the secession of the Anarchist section in 1873, he took little further part in affairs, and died at Hampstead ten years later (1883). His chief work was "Das Kapital."

Mary I., Queen of England; born in 1516, daughter of Henry VIII. by Catherine of Aragon; came to the throne in 1553, after a short struggle with Northumberland; restored the abbey lands taken by Henry VIII. and first-fruits to the papacy; deprived and imprisoned the Protestant bishops, and, having married Philip II. of Spain, persecuted the Protestants, contrary to the promises made before her accession. The end of her reign was marked by a war, in conjunction with Spain, against France, when Calais was lost by England. Died, 1558.

Mary of Guise, born in 1515; daughter of Claude, Duc de Guise; married James V. of Scotland in 1538, and became mother of Mary, Queen of Scots; as regent of Scotland, after her husband's death, opposed the Reformation, till deposed in 1559, by the Lords of the Congregation. Died, 1560.

Mary, Queen of Scots, or Mary Stuart, was born at Linlithgow, December 8, 1542; a daughter of James V. of Scotland and Mary of Lorraine, daughter of the Duke of Guise; and, on the death of her father, before she was a week old, his successor to the throne. She was educated at the French court, and when 16 years of age married the Dauphin of France, who, in 1559, succeeded his father, Henry II., under the title of Francis II. Already, however, instigated by Henry II., Francis and Mary had assumed the arms and title of the King and Queen of England, on the ground of Elizabeth's illegitimacy, and this step ultimately proved fatal to Mary. Soon after the death of her husband in 1560, she returned to Scotland, and, five years afterwards (July 29, 1565), married Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley. On the 9th of March, 1566, Darnley murdered David Rizzio, an Italian (whom he accused of improper relations with Mary), in the Palace of Holyrood; and exactly twelve months afterwards he was himself murdered by the Earl of Bothwell, who married Mary after an interval of less than three months. These proceedings, and an attempt on the part of Bothwell to secure the young Prince (afterwards James VI.) who had been born in the previous June, so incensed the nobles that they took up arms against Mary. She was able to lead an army against them, but it melted away without striking a blow on the field of Carberry, near Edinburgh (June 15, 1567); and nothing was then left to her but to abandon Bothwell, and to surrender herself to the Confederate Lords, by whom she was conducted first to Edinburgh, and next to an island castle in Loch Leven, in the county of Kinross. After a year's confinement in this castle, during which she was compelled to sign an act of abdication in favor of her son, she escaped and gathered together her supporters, but was defeated by the Regent Murray at Langside, near Glasgow (May 12, 1568), and then crossed the Solway into England, to place herself under the protection of Elizabeth. By Elizabeth, however, she was treated as a prisoner; was confined successively at Carlisle, Bolton, Tutbury, Wingfield, Coventry, Chatsworth, Sheffield, Buxton, Chartley, and Fotheringay Castle in Northamptonshire; and there at last, after nineteen years of suffering and, as was asserted, of constant conspiracy, she was brought to trial on a charge of complicity in a plot against the life of Elizabeth, and was beheaded. She was at first buried in the cathedral at Peterborough; but in 1612 her remains were removed to Westminster Abbey by her son (at this time James I. of England), and Fotheringay Castle was razed by him to the ground. Died, 1587.

Mather, Cotton, born in 1663; Puritan minister at Boston, where he carried on a witchcraft persecution, and wrote "Memorable Providences Relating to Witchcraft" and other works. Died, 1728.

Mather, Increase, father of the preceding; born in 1639 in Dorchester, Mass., where his father had been pastor; became president of Harvard in 1685, and visited England to obtain a new charter for his colony in 1688. He also wrote many works. Died, 1723.

Matthew, one of the twelve apostles of Christ, was also called Levi, and was the son of Alphaeus. He appears to have resided at Capernaum, where he was a revenue officer or publican. Of his personal history nothing more is recorded in the sacred volume.

Matthias Corvinus, King of Hungary; born in 1443; was proclaimed king in 1458, soon after his release from imprisonment at Prague; maintained the throne against the emperor, and, after having engaged in successful wars with the Turks, received the Bohemian Crown from the pope on condition of extirpating the Hussites. While thus engaged a revolt took place in Hungary, supported by Poland and other powers, which combination he routed. After this he engaged in two wars with the emperor, and captured Vienna in 1485, living there till his death, in 1490.

Maupassant, Henri Guy de (Mô-pä-son'(g)), French novelist, was born, 1850; pupil and follower of Flaubert, under whom he studied for seven years, beginning to write in 1880. His chief works are "La Maison Tellier," "Les Contes de la Bécasse," "Yvette," "Contes du Jour et de Nuit," "Pierre et Jean," and "Afloat." In 1891 his mind became deranged. Died at Passy, 1893.

Maurice of Nassau, Prince of Orange, son of William of Orange, "the Silent," was born, 1567; became Stadtholder of the United Provinces and head of the army in 1587, and successfully carried on the struggle against Spain; refused peace in 1598, but consented to a truce in 1609; afterwards supported the Romanists against the Remonstrants, and put to death Barneveldt, and concluded a treaty with France and England just before his death. Died, 1625.

Maximilian I., Emperor of Germany, son of Frederick III., born in 1459; acquired Burgundy and Flanders by marriage, which involved him in a war with France; became emperor on the death of his father, in 1493; became by marriage Duke of Milan, and brought Spain under the power of his dynasty by the marriage of his son Philip to the daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella; it was he who assembled the Diet of Augsburg at which Luther made appeal to the pope. Died, 1519.

Maximilian II., Emperor; born in 1527, son of Ferdinand I.; married a daughter of Charles V., and was made regent in 1548; was elected King of Bohemia (1562) and of Hungary (1563), and became emperor in the following year; showed great toleration in his religious policy, and tried to unite the German Protestants, besides remonstrating with Philip II. on the subject of his persecutions in the Netherlands. Died, 1576.

"Max O'Rell," nom de plume of Paul Blouet; born in 1848; French writer, who graduated at Paris in 1864-65; entered the army in 1869, was taken prisoner at Sedan, and fought against the Commune, after which he went to England as a correspondent; was French master at St. Paul's School from 1876 to 1884, and lectured in England and America. He has written "John Bull et son Ile," "Les Filles de John Bull," etc. Died, 1903.

Maxwell, James Clerk, F. R. S., physicist; born in Kirkcudbright in 1831; after being second wrangler and Smith's prizeman, became professor of natural philosophy at Aberdeen, and of physics and astronomy at King's College (1860-68). In 1871, he was elected professor of physics at Cambridge, where he made numerous researches, resulting in "The Kinetic Theory of Gases," "Electricity and Magnetism," etc. Died, 1879.

May, Sir Thomas Erskine, Right Hon., historian; born in 1815; was called to the bar in 1838, and became clerk to the House of Commons in 1871. He wrote "A Treatise on the Laws, Privileges, Proceedings, and Usage of Parliament," "The Constitutional History of England from 1760 to 1860," and several other works, and was created a peer a few days before his death. Died, 1886.

Mazarin, Giulio, Cardinal, French statesman, of Italian birth, born in 1602. After being in the diplomatic service of Spain, he went to France in 1634, as nuncio-extraordinary of the pope, and, having been favored by Richelieu, joined him five years later in opposition to the papacy, and became naturalized in France. In 1641, he was created cardinal, and, having succeeded to the place of Richelieu soon after, supported Anne of Austria, and, after having twice been exiled by his enemies' influence, was recalled by Louis XIV. in 1653, and remained supreme till his death (1661). He had a share in the Treaty of Westphalia, and negotiated the Treaty of the Pyrenees.

McBurney, Charles, surgeon; born in Roxbury, Mass., February 17, 1845; graduate of Harvard, 1866, A. M., 1869; College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, 1870. In practice as surgeon, New York, since 1870; professor of clinical surgery, College of Physicians and Surgeons, since 1896. Author: "Life of Thaddeus Stevens" (American Statesmen Series).

McClellan, George Brinton, mayor of New York; born on November 23, 1865, in Dresden, Saxony, where his parents, General George B. (U. S. A.) and Ellen M. (Marcy) McClellan, were on a visit. Graduate of Princeton, 1886; worked as reporter and in editorial positions on New York dailies; treasurer of New York and Brooklyn Bridge, 1889-92; admitted to bar, 1892; president of board of aldermen, New York, 1893 and 1894; member of Congress, 1895-1903; Democrat. Mayor of New York since January 1, 1903.

McClellan, George Brinton, American general; born in 1826; distinguished himself in the Mexican War, and drew up a report on the organization of European armies after a visit to the Crimea; during the Civil War commanded the army of the Potomac, but after indecisive engagements, was superseded in 1862 (November). In 1865, as a Democrat, he was the unsuccessful opponent of Lincoln for the presidency. In 1877, he was elected governor of New Jersey. Died, 1885.

McCutcheon, George Barr, journalist, author; born on farm, Tippecanoe County, Ind., July 26, 1866; graduate of Purdue University; city editor "Lafayette Courier," 1893. Author: "Graustark," "Beverly of Graustark," "Brewster's Millions," "Nedra," "Castle Craneycrow," "Jane Cable," "The Husbands of Edith," "Man from Brodny's," and magazine stories.

Began practice, 1872; joined in partnership by Wm. R. Mead, 1877, and by Stanford White in 1879. Awarded Royal gold medal by King Edward for promotion of architecture, 1903. Was president of American Institution of Architects. Died, 1909.

McKinley, William, twenty-fifth President of the United States; born in Niles, O., January 29, 1843. He was educated at the public schools, and at the Poland, Ohio, Academy. In May, 1861, he volunteered for the army, and entered the 23d Ohio Infantry as a private. He served four years, rising by merit and faithfulness to the captaincy of his company, and to the rank of major when mustered out in 1865. He at once began the study of law; in 1867 was admitted to the bar, and commenced practice at Canton, O., where he afterward had his residence. In 1869 he was elected prosecuting attorney for Stark County, where his success attracted local attention. Entering politics, he was elected to Congress in 1876, and was reelected for six successive terms. In 1882, his election was contested, and he was unseated, but triumphantly returned at the next election. His reputation in Congress rests chiefly on the tariff bill that bears his name. It was drawn by him as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and passed by the fifty-first Congress. This bill and his able advocacy of it before the House distinguished him as the leader of the Republican party, on the tariff question. The Republican party went before the country in 1892 almost solely on the issue raised by the McKinley tariff, but a reaction against it had set in, and Mr. Cleveland was elected. Meanwhile McKinley failed of reelection in his district, though largely reducing the adverse plurality created by a redistricting that changed the limits of the district. In 1891 he was elected governor of Ohio by a large plurality over former Governor James E. Campbell, a very popular Democrat, and reelected in 1893 in the reactionary tidal wave of politics following a contrary tariff policy, that carried the Republican party back to power in Congress, having a plurality of over 80,000. By this time his name was frequently mentioned as a future candidate for the presidency. In 1895, a systematic canvass in McKinley's behalf was instituted by his supporters, which was continued till the election of 1896. He was nominated and elected by a plurality of 603,514, and an electoral majority of 95, after a campaign of more intense interest than was displayed in any election since the Civil War.

President McKinley's first term is memorable chiefly for the occurrence of the Spanish-American War and its unexpected results. That his policy during 1896-1900 was acceptable was shown by his unanimous re-nomination and reelection in 1900 by a plurality of 849,000 and an electoral majority of 137. His second term began most auspiciously and ended tragically. On September 5, 1901, he visited the Pan-American Exposition in Buffalo, N. Y., that day having been set apart in his honor and called the "President's Day." On the afternoon of the following day, while holding a public reception in the Temple of Music, he was shot twice by Leon F. Czolgosz, an anarchist, who was at once arrested. The wounded president was first taken to the Emergency Hospital on the exposition grounds, for immediate treatment, and then removed to the residence of John G. Milburn, the president of the exposition. Hopes of his recovery were entertained for several days, but on September 13th he began to sink rapidly and died at 2.15 A. M., September 14th. His remains were removed to Washington on September 16th, laid in state in the capitol on the 17th, and taken to his home city, Canton, Ohio, where they were interred on the 18th, amid universal mourning.

McLean, Emily Nelson Ritchie (Mrs. Donald McLean), regent of New York City Chapter of Daughters of American Revolution; born in Prospect Hall, Frederick, Md., January 28, 1859; daughter of Judge John and Betty Ritchie; graduate of Frederick Seminary (now Woman's College), June, 1873; post-graduate courses in language, history, and mathematics; married in Frederick, Md., April 24, 1883, to Donald McLean. Charter member of Daughters of American Revolution; regent of New York City Chapter for seven years. Scholarship bearing her name established, 1898, in Barnard College by Daughters of American Revolution, New York Chapter. Was commissioner from New York to Cotton States and International Exposition, 1895-96; accepted appointment as commissioner to South Carolina Exposition, 1901-02. Best known by her public addresses throughout the country on patriotic and educational themes.

McMaster, John Bach, professor of American history in University of Pennsylvania since 1883; born in Brooklyn, June 29, 1852; graduate of College of City of New York, 1872, A. M., Ph. D., Litt. D., LL. D.; civil engineer, 1873-77; instructor in civil engineering Princeton, 1877-83. Author: "A History of the People of the United States" (six volumes published), "Benjamin Franklin as a Man of Letters," "With the Fathers," "Studies in American History," "Origin, Meaning, and Application of the Monroe Doctrine," "A School History of the United States," "A Primary School History of the United States," "Daniel Webster," "Brief History of the United States," "The Struggle for the Social, Political, and Industrial Rights of Man."

Meade, George Gordon, general in the United States army, was born in Cadiz, Spain, where his father was an agent of the United States navy, December 30, 1815. He graduated at West Point in 1835, and, after serving but one year in the army, resigned to begin practice as a civil engineer. He was frequently employed by the government, and reentered its military service in 1842. He served with distinction on the staffs of Taylor and Scott in the Mexican War, and in scientific work. At the outbreak of the Civil War he was placed in command of a brigade of volunteers, soon rising to the command of a division, and joining his fortunes permanently to those of the army of the Potomac. He led his division through the Seven Days' battle, being severely wounded at Glendale, through the Antietam campaign, and at Fredericksburg, where he particularly distinguished himself. At Chancellorsville he commanded the fifth corps; and when Hooker resigned the command of the army, and while the army itself was in hasty movement northward to check Lee's invasion of the North in 1863, Meade was appointed to the command. He accepted it with the greatest reluctance, and altogether from a sense of duty. He had inclined to fight on the line of Pipe Creek, to the south of Gettysburg; but Reynolds fell into collision with Lee's advance at Gettysburg, other corps hurried to support, and Gettysburg became historical. When Grant assumed general command in 1864, Meade continued to command the army of the Potomac under him, and mutual good-feeling enabled them to maintain this delicate relation without friction, and with the best results. At the close of the war, being major-general in the regular army, he commanded the military division of the Atlantic until his death at Philadelphia, November 6, 1872.

Medici, Lorenzo, "il Magnifico"; born in 1448; son of Pietro, became dominant in Florence after the suppression of the Pazzi, by whom his brother, Giuliano, had been murdered (1478). His alliance with Venice and Milan excited the jealousy of the papacy, and Sixtus IV. excommunicated Florence on his account. He was reconciled, however, with Innocent VIII., and his son, Giovanni, was made cardinal. He was a great patron and collector of manuscripts. Died, 1492.

Meissonier, Jean Louis Ernest, painter; born in Lyons in 1815; attracted attention by his "Little Messenger" in 1836, and continued to exhibit at the Paris Salon for many years, his best pictures distinguished for minute detail being the "Napoleon Cycle," among which the picture called "1814" was sold, in 1887, for the highest price ever obtained during an artist's lifetime ($170,000). Meissonier served in the Italian campaign and the early part of the Franco-Prussian War, and was colonel at the siege of Paris. Died, 1891.

Melancthon, Philip, born in 1497; German reformer; studied under Reuchlin, and was appointed professor of Greek at Wittenberg at an early age, thus becoming acquainted with Luther. He drew up the Confession of Augsburg, of which he sent a copy to the patriarch of Constantinople inviting his adhesion; and by his moderation as well as his writings did much to help the reformation. Died, 1560.

Melba, Madame, operatic vocalist, born in Australia, May 19, 1865. At 6 sang ballads to her own accompaniment at a charitable concert. Studying under Madame Marchesi in Paris, she made her stage début October 15, 1887, in "Rigoletto," at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels. Next year appeared as Lucia at Covent Garden. In 1889 played "Ophelia" at Paris Grand Opera. For her Bemberg specially wrote "Elaine," produced in London in 1892. She has taken a prominent part in recent opera seasons in London and New York, and, in 1908, proved herself equally successful in concert.

Mellen, Charles Sanger, railway official; born in Lowell, Mass., August 16, 1851; in railway service since September 22, 1869, beginning as clerk in cashier's office Northern New Hampshire R. R.; clerk to chief engineer Central Vermont R. R., 1872-73; superintendent's clerk to chief clerk and assistant treasurer of Northern New Hampshire R. R., 1873-80; assistant to manager of Boston & Lowell R. R., 1880-81; auditor, 1881-83, superintendent, 1883-84, general superintendent, 1884-88, Boston & Lowell and Concord railroads; general purchasing agent, 1888, assistant general manager, 1888-89, general traffic manager, 1889-92, Union Pacific System; general manager New York & New England R. R. at Boston, 1892; 2d vice-president New York, New Haven & Hartford R. R., 1892-96; president of Northern Pacific Railway Co., 1896-1903, New York, New Haven & Hartford R. R. Co., since 1903.

Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Felix (-bar-töl'de) a distinguished German musical composer, born in Hamburg, 1809, manifested a precocious taste and genius for music. In his 18th year he produced his famous "Overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream," as well as the opera of the "Wedding of Camacho." His fame was at once secured. In 1836, appeared his oratorio of "St. Paul," and in 1846, the magnificent one called "Elijah" — a masterpiece, second only to the greatest works of Handel. Mendelssohn's "Songs Without Words" are the most admired of his minor compositions. Died, 1847.

Meredith, George, poet and novelist, was a native of Hampshire, and was born in 1828. After studying for some time in Germany he commenced his literary career with the publication of a volume of poems. This was followed by the "Shaving of Shagpat, an Arabian Entertainment"; "Farina, a Legend of Cologne," "The Ordeal of Richard Feveril," "Modern Love: Poems and Ballads," "Emilia in England," "Rhoda Fleming," "Vittoria," "The Adventures of Harry Richmond," "The Egoist," "The Tragic Comedians," "Poems and Lyrics of the Joy of Earth," "Diana of the Crossways," "One of Our Conquerors," "Lord Ormont and his Aminta," "The Amazing Marriage," and a volume of short stories. Died, 1909.

Mergenthaler, Ottmar, inventor of the typesetting machine bearing his name, was born in Wurtemberg, Germany, in 1854; came to the United States in 1872, and received a government position in Washington to care for the mechanism of bells, clocks, and signal service apparatus; became connected with a mechanical engineering firm in Baltimore, Md., in 1876; subsequently, while still engaged with that company, he began experiments which resulted in the invention named. He died in Baltimore, Md., 1899.

Merivale, Charles, dean of Ely; born in Exeter; held a succession of appointments as lecturer; wrote a history of Rome from its foundation in 753 to the fall of Augustus in 476, but his chief work is the "History of the Romans under the Empire," indispensable as an introduction to Gibbon (1808-1893).

Merritt, Wesley, major general of United States Army, retired June 16, 1900; born in New York, June 16, 1836; graduated from West Point, 1860; commissioned brigadier-general United States volunteers, June 29, 1863; major-general, United States volunteers, April 1, 1865. Since war regularly promoted from lieutenant-colonel to major-general, United States Army. Served in army of the Potomac until June, 1864; participated in all its battles and earned six successive brevet promotions for gallantry at Gettysburg, Yellow Tavern, Hawes' Shop, Five Forks, etc. Afterward accompanied General Sheridan on cavalry raid toward Charlottesville, and engaged in battle of Trevilian's Station; commanded cavalry division in Shenandoah campaign, August, 1864, to March, 1865; was engaged in battles of Winchester, Fisher's Hill, etc.; commanded corps of cavalry in Appomattox campaign; one of three commanders from National Army to arrange with Confederate commanders for surrender of Army of Northern Virginia. After war served in various departments, participated in several Indian campaigns; superintendent of United States Military Academy, 1882-87; commanded department of the Atlantic until assigned, May, 1898, to command of United States forces in the Philippine Islands, continuing there until summoned to the aid of the American Peace Commissioners in session in Paris, December, 1898; returned to United States; on duty in command of department of the East, Governor's Island, until retirement.

Merry del Val, Raphael, pontifical secretary of state, was born in London of Spanish parents on October 10, 1865, and educated in England, where he has resided for some length of time at different periods in his career. He was at first attached to the diocese of Westminster, acted for many years as Cameriere Partecipante of Pope Leo XIII., and was appointed president of the Accademia Pontificia in 1899, and Italian Archbishop of Nicosia in 1900. He visited England as papal envoy on the occasions of Queen Victoria's Jubilee and King Edward's Coronation, and was sent to Canada on an educational mission. In July, 1903, on the death of Leo XIII., he was nominated consistorial secretary, and in October succeeded Cardinal Rampolla as secretary of state, being afterwards created a cardinal.

Metternich, Clemens Wenzel, Prince von, a great Austrian diplomatist and statesman; born in Coblenz, 1773, after a distinguished diplomatic career, became foreign minister of the empire in 1809. This high office he held with consummate ability for a period of thirty years, exercising, almost without control, the highest authority in Austria. The revolution of 1848 sent him into exile, from which he returned three years after. Died, 1859. Prince Metternich was an adroit intriguer, and exercised in his day a powerful influence upon the cabinets of Europe.

Michael VIII. (Palæologus), born in 1224, having been crowned Emperor at Nicæa with John Lascaris, regained Constantinople from the Latins in 1261, and ordered his colleague to be blinded, for which he was excommunicated and did public penance; attempted to unite the Eastern and Western Churches at the Council of Lyon (1274), and subsequently defeated a French invasion. Died, 1282.

Michelet, Jules, born in Paris, August 21, 1798; a popular French historian, for many years professor of history in the College of France. In 1843-46, he became widely known, not only in his own country, but also in England, by his attacks upon the Jesuits in his three works: "The Jesuits," "Priests, Women, and Families"; and "The People." He was the writer of many other works, several of them of considerable interest; but those of most permanent value are his "History of France," his "History of the French Revolution," and his "History of the Nineteenth Century." Died, February 9, 1874.

Miles, Nelson Appleton, an American military officer; born in Westminster, Mass., August 8, 1839. At the breaking out of the Civil War, he was engaged in mercantile pursuits in Boston, Mass.; entered the service as first lieutenant of the 22d Massachusetts Regiment in October, 1861; and distinguished himself at the battles of Fair Oaks, Charles City Cross Roads, and Malvern Hill. In September, 1862, he was commissioned colonel of the 61st New York regiment, which he led at Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville, where he was severely wounded. He commanded the first brigade, first division, second army corps, in the Richmond campaign, and was promoted brigadier-general, May 12, 1864; and brevetted major-general for gallantry at Ream's Station in December, 1864. At the close of the war he was commissioned colonel of the 40th United States Infantry. He was promoted brigadier-general in December, 1880; major-general in April, 1890; and succeeded Lieutenant-General John M. Schofield as commander of the army in 1895. He took a prominent part in the wars with the Indians in 1874, and thereafter. On July 13, 1898, he went to the front and assumed personal command of the army around Santiago, Cuba; and after the surrender of the Spanish Army commanded the expedition which left Guantánamo Bay, July 21st, landed at Guanica, Porto Rico, July 25th, and was marching on San Juan, the capital, when the armistice stopped hostile operations. On the reorganization of the army in 1901, the grade of lieutenant-general was revived and he was promoted to it. In December, 1901, he publicly expressed satisfaction with Admiral Dewey's report on Rear-Admiral Schley and was reprimanded therefor. He was retired upon reaching the age limit, August, 1903.

Professor of zoölogy at Christiania University; took an active part, 1905, in effecting separation of Norway from Sweden, and is the first Norwegian ambassador to England.

Napoleon I. was born in 1769, in Ajaccio, being the second son of Charles Bonaparte, a Corsican advocate. He was educated at Brienne, entered the French Army in 1785, and first became notable for his conduct at the siege of Toulon in 1793, when he commanded the artillery. Two years later he led the troops of the Convention against the Sections, and in 1796, soon after his first marriage, received the command of the army of Italy. After his great successes in this war, he in May, 1798, set out for Egypt, where he defeated the Mamelukes and invaded Syria, but was checked at Acre. Having left Egypt secretly he reached France in October, 1799, overthrew the Directory, and became first consul. He now again invaded Italy, and made peace with Austria and England in 1801 and 1802, reconstructing the German Empire in the interests of France, while he also concluded a concordat with the pope, and remodeled the French constitution and legal system. War broke out again with England in 1803, and Austria in 1805. He crushed the latter at Ulm and Austerlitz, but failed in his designs on the former. Next year Prussia was conquered at Jena and Auerstadt, and in 1807, after an indecisive campaign, the Peace of Tilsit was made with Russia. The continental system was now organized against England, and the crown of Spain given to Joseph Bonaparte. The second great attempt of Austria ended with the defeat of Wagram (1809); after which Napoleon divorced Josephine Beauharnais, and married Maria Louisa, daughter of the emperor. Meanwhile, however, in the Iberian Peninsula, the French arms had been held in check, and a breach with Russia occurred in 1812, the results of which were the invasion of that country, the disastrous retreat of the Grand Army and the rising of Germany. After the battle of Leipzig, France was invaded from east and south, and on April 11, 1814, Napoleon abdicated, and was banished to Elba. Next year he escaped, held France at his feet, but after a hundred days met his final defeat at Waterloo (June 18, 1815). He passed the rest of his life in exile at St. Helena, where he dictated his "Memoirs." Died, 1821.

Napoleon III., born in 1808; the third son of Louis Bonaparte, King of Holland, and Hortense de Beauharnais; became head of the house after the death of his elder brothers and of the King of Rome, and in 1836, made a first attempt to assert his claims, the result of which was exile to the United States. In 1840, he made another attempt, for which he was imprisoned in the castle of Ham, whence he escaped to England in May, 1846. He was elected to the Assembly in 1848, and soon after became president of the republic. After the coup d'état of December, 1851, his term of office was prolonged to ten years, and less than a year later a plebiscite was held, and Louis Napoleon became Emperor of the French. He joined England in the Crimean War, and in 1859 (in which year his life was attempted by Orsini), helped Sardinia against the Austrians, and also took part in the operations against China (1858-60), and Mehemet Ali (1860-61), but he failed in Mexico in 1861, and his government becoming increasingly unpopular in France, he sought a remedy in the quarrel with Prussia. The result was his defeat and capture at Sedan (September 1, 1870), after which he was deposed, and on his release lived in England till his death. Napoleon III. was the author of several works, the chief of which were "La Vie de César," and "Des Idées Napoleonniennes." Died, 1873.

Neilson, Adelaide, an English actress; born in Leeds, Yorkshire, England, March 3, 1848. Her real name was Elizabeth Ann Brown, though she was sometimes called Lizzie Bland (Bland being the name of her step-father). She made her début as Juliet when only 17 years old. She appeared as Amy Robsart in 1870, in London, with immense success, and by 1878, stood at the head of her profession. In 1872, she came to the United States, playing in Booth's theater, New York, and in Boston, where she was equally successful. She made four visits to the United States, her last one being in 1880. She died in Paris, France, August 15, 1880.

Nelson, Horatio, Viscount, born in 1758; English admiral, son of a Norfolk clergyman; entered the navy in 1770, served in the American War, and under Lord Hood in the war with revolutionary France, becoming commodore in 1796, and rear-admiral after the battle of Cape St. Vincent, 1797. In the following year he won the battle of the Nile, for which he was made baron, and in 1801, brilliantly disobeyed Sir Hyde Parker, by attacking Copenhagen. After this he commanded in the Mediterranean, and on October 21, 1805, saved England from invasion by his defeat of the combined French and Spanish fleets at Trafalgar, but fell in the action.

Nepos, Cornelius, a Roman historian who flourished during the time of Julius Cæsar and the first six years of the reign of Augustus. He enjoyed the friendship of Cicero, and his only extant work "Vitæ Excellentium Imperatorum," is held in high esteem as an educational textbook.

Nero, Lucius Domitius, born in 37; Emperor of Rome, grandson of Germanicus; was adopted by Claudius in the year 50, and succeeded him in 54. He caused his mother, Agrippina, to be murdered for opposing his divorce from Octavia and marriage with Poppæa Sabina, this being accomplished by the murder of the former. He persecuted the Christians, whom he charged with the burning of Rome in 64, and married Messalina after the death of his second wife. The conspiracy of Piso was discovered, but on the success of that of Galba, Nero put an end to his life.

Nerva, Marcus Cocceius, a Roman Emperor, born in Umbria, A. D. 32, after being twice consul, was proclaimed emperor on the death of Domitian, 96. He ruled with mildness and justice, and, after adopting Trajan as his son and successor, died, 98.

Newman, John Henry, Cardinal, born in 1801; theologian, son of a London banker; graduated from Trinity College, Oxford, in 1820, and was elected Fellow of Oriel. He took orders in 1824, when he became vice-principal of St. Alban's Hall, and in 1828, became vicar of St. Mary's. He took a leading part in the Tractarian movement, and in 1841, wrote "Tract XC.," which was severely condemned. After living at Littlemore for some years in seclusion, he was received into the Roman Church, in 1845; founded the Brompton oratory in 1850, and directed the Edgbaston oratory for the greater part of his remaining years. He took part in controversies with Kingsley in 1864, and Mr. Gladstone in 1874, and accepted the Infallibility dogma with some reservations. He was created cardinal in 1879. Chief among his works were "Apologia pro Vita Sua, An Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent," and "The Dream of Gerontius." Died, 1890.

Newton, Sir Isaac, the greatest of philosophers, was born, December 25, 1642, at Colsterworth, in Lincolnshire, and early displayed a talent for mechanics and drawing. He was educated at Grantham School, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, and studied mathematics with the utmost assiduity. In 1667, he obtained a fellowship; in 1669, the mathematical professorship; and in 1671, he became a member of the Royal Society. It was during his abode at Cambridge that he made his three great discoveries, of fluxions, the nature of light and colors, and the laws of gravitation. To the latter of these his attention was first turned by his seeing an apple fall from a tree. The "Principia," which unfolded to the world the theory of the universe, was not published till 1687. In that year also Newton was chosen one of the delegates to defend the privileges of the university against James II.; and in 1688, and 1701, he was elected one of the members of the university. He was appointed warden of the mint in 1696; was made master of it in 1699; was chosen president of the Royal Society in 1703; and was knighted in 1705. He died, March 20, 1727. Among his works are: "Arithmetica Universalis," "A New Method of Infinite Series and Fluxions," "Optics," "The Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms," amended; and "Observations on the Prophecies of Daniel," and the "Apocalypse."

Died, 1815.

Nicholas II., who on November 1, 1894, succeeded Alexander III. as "Emperor of All the Russias," was born in St. Petersburg on May 18, 1868, his mother being the Princess Dagmar, a daughter of the late King Christian IX. of Denmark, and sister to Queen Alexandra, the Duchess of Cumberland, and the King of Greece. During the famine of 1891, he was, at his own request, made president of the committee of succor, and worked hard in the organization of relief. As Czarevitch he held several military commands in his own country — in the famous Préobrajensky regiment among others — and in England he had conferred upon him, in 1893, the order of the garter. He married the Princess Alix of Hesse-Darmstadt in November, 1894. Four daughters came first, but a son was born on August 12, 1904, and was named Alexis. The coronation of the czar took place with impressive ceremonial at Moscow in May, 1896, and in August of the same year he commenced a tour which included visits to the Emperor of Austria and Germany, to the King of Denmark, to Queen Victoria, and to the President of France. The famous peace proposals which he made to the powers during 1898, led to the first peace conference at The Hague in 1899, the establishment of the Permanent Court of Arbitration there, and indirectly to the second conference in 1907. He is gifted with the linguistic facility of most of his countrymen, and fluently speaks French, German, Italian, and especially English, of whose literature he has a thorough knowledge. The czar must belong to the Orthodox Greek Church, and his consent is necessary to the marriage of any prince or princess of the Imperial family.

Resumed practice of law.

Omar Khayyam (ô'mur ky-ya'm), astronomer-poet of Persia, born in Naishapur, in Khorassan; lived in the later half of the Eleventh Century, and died in the first quarter of the Twelfth. He wrote a collection of poems which breathe an Epicurean spirit, and while they occupy themselves with serious problems of life, do so with careless sportiveness, intent on the enjoyment of the sensuous pleasures of life, like an easy-going Epicurean. The great problems of destiny do not trouble the author, they are no concern of his, and the burden of his songs assuredly is, as his translator says, "If not, 'let us eat, let us drink, for to-morrow we die.'"

Parnell, Charles Stewart, Irish politician; was born in 1846, in Avondale, County Wicklow, and educated at Cambridge. He entered public life as member for Meath in 1875, and two years later became conspicuous by the "obstruction" with which he met the prisons bill. He gradually ousted Mr. Butt from the leadership of the home rule party, and, in 1880, became leader of the Irish party and entered upon the land agitation. At the general election he was elected for three constituencies, but chose Cork, and as the head of the Land League was prosecuted in 1880, by the Gladstone government, the result being a disagreement of the jury. In the following session he, with the majority of his followers, was removed by the sergeant-at-arms for obstruction, and in October was imprisoned in Kilmainham under the coercion bill. He was released in April, 1882, but the "no rent" manifesto had meanwhile been issued, and in 1883, the National League took the place of the suppressed Land League. At the general election of 1885, he nominated every home rule candidate, and subsequently entered into an alliance with the followers of Mr. Gladstone. In the next parliament he proposed a bill to suspend evictions and reduce rent, after the rejection of which the agitation continued. In 1888, a special commission was appointed to examine the charges made against Mr. Parnell and others by the "Times," the result being his acquittal on the greatest, but condemnation on many others. In consequence of the result of the O'Shea divorce case in 1890, he was deposed by the majority of his party, but continued to lead the minority and to carry on an active campaign until his death in 1891.

Paul, St., this eminent apostle, originally named Saul, was a Jew of pure Hebrew descent, of the tribe of Benjamin. He was born at Tarsus in Cilicia, and was by birth a free Roman citizen. The mysterious circumstances that led to and attended his conversion, and his apostolic travels, are, doubtless, familiar to our readers, and need not be given here. Much diversity of opinion, however, prevails among the learned about the dates of the principal events of his life. About the year 59, having visited Jerusalem for the fifth time since his conversion, the populace there assailed him, and would have killed him, but an officer took him into custody and sent him to the Roman Governor Felix, at Cæsarea, where he was unjustly detained a prisoner for two years. Having finally appealed to the Roman Emperor, according to the privilege of a Roman citizen, he was sent to Rome. On the voyage thither, he suffered shipwreck at Melita (probably Malta), in the spring of A. D. 61.

At Rome, he was treated with respect, being allowed to dwell "for two whole years in his own hired house." Whether he ever left the city or not cannot be positively demonstrated, but it is believed by many critics, from a variety of considerations, that he did obtain his liberty about A. D. 64, and that he made journeys both to the East and to the West, revisiting Asia Minor, and carrying out his long-cherished wish of preaching the gospel in Spain, then thought to be the western limit of the world. Meanwhile occurred the great and mysterious burning of Rome, generally attributed to Nero. The latter threw the blame on the Christians, who were, in consequence, subjected to a severe persecution. Among the victims was Paul, who, according to tradition, suffered A. D. 67.

Payne, John Howard, born in 1792; American actor and dramatist; wrote for the press at 13, and appeared on the stage at 16; made his debut at Drury Lane in 1812, when 20, and composed a number of pieces, in one of which the air "Home, Sweet Home" was first heard. Peter, St., one of the foremost of the twelve apostles; originally called Simon, he was the son of Jona, and a resident at Bethsaida; his brother Andrew, being a disciple of John the Baptist, was by John directed to Jesus; and speedily he prevailed on Simon to accompany him to one who he felt convinced was the predicted Messiah. Our Lord kindly received the newcomer, and gave him the name of Cephas, the Aramaic equivalent to the Greek Peter (John i. 35-42). Peter was a man of ardent temperament, affectionate and generous. He was favored with special manifestations of his Master's confidence, and performed a more prominent part in the sacred history than any other of the twelve disciples. He was crucified with his head downwards in the persecution under Nero, about A. D. 66.

Peter I., Tsar of Russia (Peter the Great); born in 1672; was joint ruler with Ivan V. from 1682 till 1689, when he became sole sovereign; visited Holland and England to learn ship-building, and on his return suppressed the conspiracy of the Strelitz (1698); founded St. Petersburg in 1703, and, after a defeat at Narva, won the victory of Pultowa over Charles XII. of Sweden in 1709. Petrarca, Francesco, Italian poet; born in Arezzo in 1304; lived chiefly at Avignon, but passed his later years at Milan, Venice, and Padua; with Boccaccio took an active part in the revival of learning, and was crowned as laureate in the capitol by King Robert of Anjou in 1341. His chief works are "Sonnetti," "Canzoni et Trionfi" (in praise of Laura, a married lady whom he met at Avignon in 1327), and some Latin treatises. Died in Arquà in 1374.

Phidias, one of the greatest of sculptors, an Athenian; is supposed to have been born about 497 or 498 B. C. Little, however, is known respecting his life. Hippias is stated by some to have been his master, and Eladas by others. He executed several statues of Minerva, particularly that in the Parthenon (the works of which temple he superintended); a statue of Jupiter Olympius; and various other admirable productions. Died, 431 B. C.

Philip, one of the twelve apostles, according to John's Gospel, "of Bethsaida, the city of Andrew and Peter," and who was called to follow Jesus at Bethany. After the resurrection he was present at the election of Matthias to the apostleship, but is not again mentioned. Philip the Evangelist, often comfounded with the above, is first mentioned in Acts vi: 5. He preached at Smyrna, where Simon Magus was one of his converts; baptized the Ethiopian eunuch; and entertained Paul and his companion on their way to Jerusalem.

Philip, an Indian chief, whose father had been a staunch friend of the Pilgrim settlers, was himself friendly to the colonists, till in 1671 their encroachments provoked him to retaliation; after six years' fighting, in which many colonists perished and great massacres of Indians took place, he was defeated and slain in 1676.

Philip II., King of Macedon; born B. C. 382; ascended the throne in 360 B. C.; instituted the phalanx, made Thrace and Thessaly tributary, defeated the Athenians at Chæronea (338), but was assassinated at Aegæ two years later. Died, 336 B. C.

Philip II. of Spain, born in 1527; succeeded upon the abdication of Charles V. in 1555. He married (1) Isabella of Portugal, (2) Mary of England, (3) Anne of Austria. His reign was marked by the revolt of the Netherlands, the annexation of Portugal (1580), the defeat of the Turks at Lepanto (1571), and the loss of the Armada (1588). Died, 1598.

Phillips, Wendell, an American orator and abolitionist; born in Boston, Mass., November 29, 1811. He was graduated at Harvard in 1831, studied law there, and was called to the bar in 1834. But before clients came he had been drawn away from his profession to the real work of his life. A timely speech in Faneuil Hall in 1837, made him at once the principal orator of the anti-slavery party; and henceforth, till the president's proclamation of January 1, 1863, he was Garrison's loyal and valued ally, his lectures and addresses doing more for their cause than can well be estimated. He also championed the cause of temperance, and that of women, and advocated the rights of the Indians. In 1870, he was nominated governor by the Prohibitionists and the Labor party. His speeches and letters were collected in 1863 (new edition 1884). He died in Boston, Mass., February 2, 1884.

Pitt, William, born in 1759; statesman; second son of Lord Chatham; was returned for Appleby in 1780, as a follower of Shelburne, whose chancellor of the exchequer he became two years later. After the defeat of the Coalition ministry, Pitt became prime minister, at first in a minority. After the dissolution of 1786, however, he had a majority, with which he passed his India Bill, and carried on the war with revolutionary France. In 1801, he resigned on account of the king's opposition to the removal of Catholic disabilities, with which Pitt had hoped to accompany the Act of Union. From 1804, till his death (1806), Pitt was again in office, and continued to direct the struggle against France.

Pius V., Ghislieri, born in 1504; elected in 1566, having previously been inquisitor-general; excommunicated Queen Elizabeth and suppressed heresy, but also carried out reforms, and encouraged Spain and Venice in their war against the Turks. Died, 1572.

Pius IX., Giovanni Mastai-Ferretti, born in 1792; was elected in 1846, and immediately granted a constitution, but refused to declare war against Austria. After the insurrection at Rome (1848), he fled to Gaeta, but was restored by French aid two years later. The same year he established a Catholic hierarchy in England, and in 1854, defined the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. In 1859-60 he lost the greater part of his dominions, but was maintained in Rome by a French garrison. In 1870, the Infallibility dogma was promulgated by the œumenical council held at Rome. In that year, when the French left the city, it was declared the capital of Italy, and occupied by the troops of Victor Emmanuel. Died, 1878.

Pius X., is the 258th Roman Pontiff. His name is Giuseppe (Joseph) Sarto, and he was born in June 2, 1835, at Riese, in the diocese of Treviso, his father being a minor municipal official. His relatives are still shopkeepers and people of humble position. He was educated at Castelfranco and the diocesan seminary of Padua, and ordained priest September 18, 1858. He officiated nine years as curate at Tombolo, nine years as parish priest of Salzano; and was made canon and chancellor of the diocese of Treviso in 1875. In 1884, he was appointed Bishop of Mantua, and Leo XIII. made him a cardinal and patriarch of Venice, in 1893. His charity and tact brought him unbounded popularity, and he was more than once instrumental in settling serious strikes and labor disputes. He came into direct personal contact with the King and Queen of Italy while he was cardinal, but he is credited with an inflexible resolve to maintain the rights and liberty of the Church. On the death of Leo XIII., July 20, 1903, the conclave met, July 31st, and on August 4th, at the seventh scrutiny, elected Cardinal Sarto as pope, and he chose to be known as Pope Pius X. As priest and bishop his life was spent in the pastoral and episcopal service of the Church rather than in the paths of diplomatic and official service. He has always displayed deep interest in social questions and in bettering the life of the poor, to whom his charity at Venice was proverbial. He has shown himself zealous in the reform of Church music and in other matters of ecclesiastical discipline. In May, 1907, he issued a decree entrusting the revision of the vulgate to the Benedictine Order, and in September issued an encyclical against the modernist movement in the Church.

Pizarro, Francisco, born in 1475; Spanish conqueror of Peru; embarked for America in 1510, and, in 1530, first visited Peru. The next year he returned, and, taking advantage of a civil war, got possession of the country, founding Lima in 1535. Six years later he was assassinated by the friends of Almagro, a rival whom he had caused to be executed. His brother, Gonzalo, who had accompanied him, was put to death in 1548, for a revolt against the Spanish viceroy. Died, 1541.

Plato, a Greek philosopher; born in Athens or in Ægina, in May 429 B. C., the year in which Pericles died. He was a disciple of Socrates, and after the death of that philosopher, Plato himself became a teacher in the plane tree grove of the Academia. He had a great number of disciples, many of whom became eminent teachers. Among them was Aristotle, distinguished as the "Mind of the School," and perhaps Demosthenes. Women are said to have attended. In his 40th year, Plato visited Sicily, but he offended the tyrant Dionysius by the political opinions he uttered, and only escaped death through the influence of his friend, Dion. Two later visits to the court of the younger Dionysius were the only interruptions to his calm life as a teacher and writer at Athens. He died in the act of writing, it is said, in May, 347 B. C.

Roberts, Frederick, Lord, an English military officer; born in Cawnpur, India, September 30, 1832. He was taken to England when two years old, educated at Clifton, Eton, Sandhurst, and Addiscombe, and entered the Bengal Artillery in 1851. His first taste of actual warfare was in the hot time of the siege of Delhi, during the mutiny, and he took an active part in the subsequent operations down to the relief of Lucknow. He discharged the duties of assistant quartermaster-general in the Abyssinian expedition of 1868, and in the Lushai expedition of 1871-1872. On the outbreak of the Afghan War in 1878, Roberts, now major-general, was appointed to command the Kurram division of the army. He forced in brilliant fashion the Afghan position on the peak of Peiwar Kotul (8,500 feet above sea-level). After the murder of Sir Louis Cavagnari and the escort of the British mission at Kabul, he was given command of the force sent to avenge them. He defeated the Afghans at Charasia on October 6th, took possession of Kabul on the 12th, and assumed the government of the country. On August 9th, Sir F. Roberts set out on his memorable march through the heart of Afghanistan to the relief of Kandahar, which he reached three weeks later. He immediately gave battle to Ayub Khan and routed him completely, capturing all his artillery and his camp; was appointed commander-in-chief of the Madras army (1881), and held the rank of commander-in-chief in India (1885-1893). He was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in Ireland in 1895; and in 1899 took command of the English forces in South Africa; capturing Cronje, relieving Kimberly, and annexing the two republics. He returned to England and was made commander-in-chief to succeed Lord Wolseley.

Robespierre, Maximilien Marie Isidore (rôb'aiz-peer), a French revolutionist, was born at Arras, 1758. After studying law and gaining some distinction as an advocate, he entered the States-General in 1789, as one of the representatives of Artois. In that assembly he soon made his mark as a rabid Democrat, and attached himself to the Jacobin body. In 1792, the City of Paris elected him one of its deputies to the convention, where he speedily became the leader of the Mountain party, in its struggles with the Girondins. Over the latter, with the help of the Commune of Paris and the mob, he achieved a decisive triumph in June, 1793. After this he inaugurated the Reign of Terror, by constituting himself president of the committee of public safety, and associating along with him Couthon and St. Just. In 1794, being by this time in possession of almost unlimited power, Robespierre opened the régime of the guillotine by first sacrificing his Girondist rivals, and then sending indiscriminately to their death thousands of innocent persons of both sexes. The excesses of this monster at last raised against him a strong combination of opponents, and the convention declaring him an outlaw, Robespierre perished under the guillotine, July 28, 1794.

Rubens, Peter Paul, a distinguished Flemish painter; born in Siegen, Westphalia, June 29, 1577. He went to Antwerp in 1608, and was soon after made court painter to the Archduke Albert, Spanish governor of the Low Countries. In 1620 he was employed by the Princess Mary de Medici to adorn the gallery of the Luxembourg with a series of paintings illustrative of the principal scenes of her life. While thus engaged he became known to the Duke of Buckingham, who purchased his museum. He was afterward employed by the Infanta Isabella and the King of Spain in some important negotiations which he executed with such credit as to be appointed secretary of the Privy Council. He acquired immense wealth, and was twice married, the second time, in 1631, to a girl of sixteen. Rubens, beyond all comparison, was the most rapid in execution of all the great masters, and was incontestably the greatest perfecter of the mechanical part of his art that ever existed. His works are very numerous, and very diversified in subject. There are nearly 100 in the picture gallery at Munich. "The Descent from the Cross," at Antwerp, is perhaps his masterpiece. He died in Antwerp, May 30, 1640.

Rudolf, or Rodolf I., King of Germany, founder of the Habsburg Dynasty, was born 1218; was elected emperor in 1273, and, by his concessions to Gregory XI. at his coronation, ended the feud with the pope. A war with Ottocar, King of Bohemia, was terminated by the defeat and death of the latter in 1278. His son, Wenceslaus, did homage to Rudolf for Bohemia and Moravia. Rudolf curbed the power of the nobles, and granted charters to many towns. Died, 1291.

Shakespeare, or Shakspeare, William, the greatest of the English dramatic poets, was born in Stratford-on-Avon, Warwickshire, in 1564. Of the incidents of his youth almost nothing is known, excepting that he married in his 19th year, and soon afterwards resorted to London, where he became an actor of repute at the Globe and Blackfriars' theaters. In 1594, he inaugurated his literary career by the publication of his poem "Venus and Adonis"; and, in the following year, his first published play appeared, the precursor of a succession of works which constitute the crowning glory of English dramatic literature. Shakespeare enjoyed the favor of Queen Elizabeth and James I., and the friendship of Southampton, Raleigh, Ben Jonson, and other of the principal of his contemporaries. After realizing an easy fortune by his contributions to the stage, he retired to his native town, and there died in 1616. Shakespeare's tragedies of "Hamlet," "Macbeth," "Othello," "Romeo and Juliet," and "King Lear" are wonderful examples of his power of expressing the strongest passions of the human soul; while, on the other hand, his comedies, particularly "The Merry Wives of Windsor," "Much Ado About Nothing," "Twelfth Night," "The Taming of the Shrew," etc., are unsurpassed in the English language. Of his dramas, strictly so called, perhaps the finest are "As You Like It," "The Merchant of Venice," and "The Tempest."

After the rebellion was put down, however, he was pardoned by the government, and later, in his old age, was allowed a pension for his services during the Revolutionary War. He died in Sparta, N. Y., September 29, 1825.

Shelley, Percy Bysshe, one of the most eminent of English poets, was born of a noble family, in County Sussex, in 1792. He was early distinguished by his original turn of mind for speculative inquiry, and was expelled from Oxford University on an alleged charge of atheism. Refusing to recant certain philosophical opinions he had formed, and which had given rise to his expulsion, he incurred the displeasure of his father and family. Retiring to London, he there entered upon authorship by the production of his fine poem of "Queen Mab," and contracted an unfortunate marriage with a person of humble rank, from whom he soon separated. In 1816, after the death of his first wife, he married the daughter of William Godwin, so celebrated as the authoress of "Frankenstein"; and, in the following year, gave to the world his principal work, "The Revolt of Islam." In 1818, he quitted England never to return, and took up his residence in Italy, where he became the associate of Lord Byron and Leigh Hunt, and where he wrote his tragedy of "The Cenci"; the "Prometheus Unbound," together with many of his minor and most exquisite poems. In 1822, he perished by the capsizing of his boat, while sailing in the Gulf of Leghorn.

C., August 11, 1847; academic education; joined Confederate States Army, July, 1864, but was stricken with severe illness which caused the loss of his left eye and kept him an invalid for two years, so that he saw no military service; followed farming as his sole pursuit until 1886, when he became prominent in an agitation for industrial and technical education and other reforms. Was elected governor of South Carolina in 1890 and 1892, and United States senator since 1895. Founded Clemson Agricultural and Mechanical College at Calhoun's old home, Fort Hill, and also Winthrop Normal and Industrial College at Rock Hill; the first for boys, the last for girls; they are the two largest schools of the kind in the South; author of the dispensary system of selling liquor under State control; was central figure in the South Carolina Constitutional Convention, 1895, which instituted educational qualification for suffrage; one of the leaders in securing the insertion of advanced positions in Democrat platform of 1896. Prominent in Democratic National conventions of 1900 and 1904, and in latter was active in work of harmonizing contending factions of Democracy.

Til'ly, Johann Tserklaes, Count of, one of the great generals of the Thirty Years' War; born in Brabant in 1559; was designed for the priesthood and educated by Jesuits, but abandoned the church for the army. He was trained in the art of war by Parma and Alva, and proved himself a born soldier. He reorganized the Bavarian Army, and, devoted to the Catholic cause, was given command of the Catholic Army at the outbreak of the Thirty Years' War, during the course of which he won many notable battles, acting later on in conjunction with Wallenstein, whom, in 1630, he succeeded as commander-in-chief of the imperial forces, and in the following year sacked with merciless cruelty the town of Magdeburg, a deed which Gustavus Adolphus was swift to avenge by crushing the Catholic forces in two successive battles — at Breitenfeld and at Rain — in the latter of which Tilly was mortally wounded (1632).

Among his masterpieces is the "Bacchus and Ariadne" in the National Gallery, London. Died, 1576.

Togo, Count Heihachiro, admiral in command of the Japanese fleet — the Nelson of Japan — was born in 1847. After Nogi's guns from the land had completed the destruction of the Port Arthur fleet, Togo hid his ships for three months, pending the arrival of the Baltic fleet. Numerically the Russians were his superior, notably in battleships; but in speed, manœuvring, gunfire, and discipline, the advantage was all with the Japanese. The battle of the Sea of Japan was fought May 27-28, 1905, when of the Baltic fleet twenty ships were sunk, six captured, two demolished and six disarmed and interned. Admirals Rojestvensky and Nebogatoff were captured with some 8,000 men, while 4,000 Russians were killed. The Japanese losses were three torpedo boats sunk, 116 men killed, and 538 wounded. Made count, 1907.

Toussaint L'Ouverture, François Dominique; born in 1743; son of African slaves, in San Domingo. He was, in 1796, appointed by the Directory chief of the army of San Domingo, and afterwards established his authority throughout the island, which he ruled with justice and vigor. When Bonaparte sought to restore slavery in San Domingo (1801), Toussaint resisted, but was forced to surrender, and was sent to France, where he died in prison in 1803.

Tree, Herbert Beerbohm, actor, is the son of a grain merchant named Beerbohm, and was born in London in 1853. Shortly after entering his father's office, in 1870, he became a member of the irrationals amateur dramatic club, and joined the profession in 1877. His first hit was as the timid curate in "The Private Secretary," and immediately after he played the grim spy Macari in "Called Back." Taking the Comedy Theater (1887), he produced "The Red Lamp"; and in the autumn of the same year took the Haymarket Theater. In April, 1897, he opened his new theater, "His Majesty's," in the Haymarket. Here he has produced the greatest of his successes: "Julius Cæsar," "King John," "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and "Herod," "Twelfth Night," "The Merry Wives of Windsor," with Miss Ellen Terry and Mrs. Kendal in the cast, "Ulysses," "The Eternal City," "King Richard II.," "The Darling of the Gods," "The Tempest," "Much Ado About Nothing," "Business is Business," "Oliver Twist," "Nero," and "Colonel Newcome." In 1905, he inaugurated a Shakespeare Festival, which is now one of the annual arrangements of the theater. During the Shakespeare celebrations in 1906, he revived "Hamlet," "Julius Cæsar," "Twelfth Night," "Much Ado About Nothing," "Henry IV." (Part I.), and "The Tempest." In April, 1907, he produced several of Shakespeare's plays in Berlin, and was received by the German Emperor. His wife, an admirable Greek scholar formerly connected with Queen's College, is a very refined actress.

Van Buren, Martin, American statesman, and eighth President of the United States; was born of Knickerbocker stock, in Columbia County, N. Y., 1782. After studying law and becoming a member of the bar, he was elected by the Democratic party to the State Senate in 1812, and became attorney-general in 1815. In 1816, he largely contributed to the organization of the so-called Albany regency, a political body which maintained a political ascendancy for many years in the State. In 1821, Van Buren entered the National Senate, and was reelected in 1827. As a senator he supported the protective tariff of 1828, and in the same year was elected governor of New York. In 1830, he took office as secretary of state in President Jackson's cabinet, resigning the same in April of the following year. After the rejection by the senate of his nomination as minister to England, he was elected in the Jackson interest vice-president of the republic, and in 1836, became the successful Democratic candidate for the presidential chair. During his tenure of office occurred the financial crisis of 1837; and the suspension of specie payments by the banks; a state of things which induced the president to recommend to Congress the establishment of an independent treasury — a measure carried into effect in 1840. In the latter year, Van Buren's renomination for the presidency was defeated by General Harrison, and in 1841, he temporarily retired into private life. His third candidature for the presidency, in 1844, was frustrated by the Southern vote, and he subsequently seceded from the Democrats to become a Free-soiler, and the unsuccessful nominee of the latter party in the presidential election in 1848. Died, 1862.

Vanderbilt, Cornelius, American capitalist; born near Stapleton, Staten Island, N. Y., May 27, 1794; early engaged in steamboat transportation between Staten Island and New York and so enlarged his business that he soon gained the complete control of the New York and Staten Island lines. Later, he started steamboats in various waters — the Hudson, the Delaware, Long Island Sound, and established steamboats and other connections between New York and California. In 1864, he withdrew his capital from shipping and invested it in railroads. He secured the management of one railroad after another and, in 1877, controlled stocks representing an aggregate capital of $150,000,000, of which he owned fully one-half. In 1861, he presented the swift $800,000 steamship "Vanderbilt" to the United States Government to be used for the capture of Confederate privateers, and in 1872, founded the Vanderbilt University in Nashville, Tenn., with $500,000, afterward increased to $700,000. At the time of his death in New York City, January 4, 1877, his fortune was estimated at nearly $100,000,000, and he was supposed to be the richest man in the world.

of noble Bohemian family; after serving against the Turks, the Venetians, and Bethlen Gabor, raised an army at his own expense, in 1626, for the emperor, and defeated Mansfeld and the Danes. In 1630, he was deprived of his command by the jealousy of the League, but was soon recalled to oppose Gustavus Adolphus. The Swedish king was repulsed at Breitenfeld (1632), but Wallenstein was defeated at Lützen, where Gustavus fell. After his defeat he negotiated with France, and having been outlawed by the emperor, was assassinated at Eger, 1634.

Walter, Thomas Ustick, an American architect; born in Philadelphia, Pa., September 4, 1804. In 1833, he made the designs for the Girard College building, which on its completion in 1847, was pronounced the finest specimen of classic architecture in the United States. His next great work was the breakwater at Laguayra for the Venezuelan Government. In 1851, his design for the extension of the National Capitol at Washington, D. C., was adopted. Having been appointed government architect, he removed to Washington, and remained there till the completion of the work in 1865. While in Washington he also designed the extensions of the patent office, treasury, and post-office buildings, the dome of the capitol, and the government hospital for the insane. He died in Philadelphia, Pa., October 30, 1887.

Ward, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, author; born in Boston, Mass., August 31, 1844; daughter of Rev. Austin and Elizabeth Stuart Phelps; married October 20, 1888. Herbert D. Ward began to write for press when 13 years old. Ward), "The Master of the Magicians" (with Herbert D. Ward), "Fourteen to One," "Donald Marcy," "A Singular Life," "The Supply at St. Agatha's," "Chapters from a Life," "The Story of Jesus Christ," "Within the Gates," "Successors to Mary the First," "Avery," "Trixy," "A Lost Hero" (with Herbert D. Ward).

Warren, Samuel, born in 1807; English lawyer and writer, whose chief works were "Diary of a Late Physician," "Ten Thousand a Year," and "The Moral and Intellectual Development of the Age"; was appointed master in lunacy in 1859. Died, 1877.

Warwick, Richard Neville, Earl of, "the king-maker"; born about 1420; was created earl in 1449, and joined the Yorkists, getting Edward IV. crowned by his influence, and defeating his enemies at Towton (1461); quarreled with Edward, and restored Henry VI. in 1470, but was defeated and slain (1471), at Barnet next year.

Washington, Booker Taliaferro, principal of Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute since 1881; born near Hale's Ford, Va., about 1859; of African descent; graduated from Hampton Institute, Virginia, 1875 (A. M., Harvard, 1896; LL. D., Dartmouth, 1901); was teacher at Hampton Institute until elected by State authorities as head of Tuskegee Institute, which he organized and has made successful; is writer and speaker on racial and educational subjects. Author: "Sowing and Reaping," "Up From Slavery," "Future of the American Negro," "Character Building," "Story of My Life and Work," "Working With Hands," "Tuskegee and Its People."

Washington, George, illustrious American patriot, general, and statesman, and first President of the United States; was born in Westmoreland County, Va., February 22, 1732. He descended from an old English family, one of whose younger sons—his great-grandfather John—emigrated to Virginia in 1657. Washington inherited a considerable farm on the banks of the Rappahannock, and after leaving school in 1747, passed much of his time with Lord Fairfax, and the latter's cousin, Sir William, both great feudal proprietors in the colony. Between 1748-1751, young Washington was employed by Lord Fairfax in surveying certain outlying properties of his beyond the Blue Ridge, and, at the age of 19, was appointed adjutant-general (holding the rank of major) of one of the military districts formed in Virginia at the outbreak of the war with France. In 1754, Washington, as lieutenant-colonel, defeated the French on the frontier, and afterwards accompanied General Braddock as aide-camp in his untoward expedition against Fort Duquesne. In the following year he was made commander-in-chief of the forces ordered to be raised by the Assembly of Virginia for the defense of the provinces, and commanded a division of the force which took Fort Duquesne in 1758. Marrying in the next year, Washington resigned his commission, and settled down at Mount Vernon as a planter, and occupied himself for some years in the cultivation of his enlarged estate. Though long a member of the House of Burgesses, Washington does not appear to have taken any prominent part in its deliberations; although, in 1773, he became one of the delegates to the Williamsburg Convention, met to declare the right of the colonists to self-government, and in 1774, one of the five representatives of Virginia at the General Congress in Philadelphia.

On the breaking out of armed resistance to the home country, the Continental Congress at once conferred the chief command upon Washington. The latter found himself entrusted with a task of no ordinary weight and responsibility. In the face of well-appointed and successful British armies already on American soil, he had to oppose to them undisciplined and raw militia, ill-found in war material, and with a government to fall back upon almost destitute of both money and credit. He, however, proved himself equal to the exigency of the situation, and met the enemy at Long Island, N. Y., where he was defeated with heavy loss, and compelled to make a disastrous retreat through the Jerseys into Pennsylvania. In 1776-77, he gained advantage at Trenton and Princeton, only to be badly defeated at Brandywine, on September 11th of the latter year, thus allowing the British troops to occupy Philadelphia. The surrender of Burgoyne at Saratoga, in the following month, served to brighten the American cause, since it procured for the colonists the support of France. In 1778, Washington fought an indecisive battle at Monmouth courthouse with Sir Henry Clinton, after which he was compelled to remain in defensive inactivity, in consequence of the destitute condition of his army and the exhaustion of the public treasury, until July, 1780, when a French army of 6,000 men arrived to the assistance of the insurgents. In that year, too, occurred the treason of General Arnold, and the sad episode of the fate of André. In 1781, the Articles of Confederation between the States were ratified, and the war was transferred to the South with varying success. This state of things lasted until September of that year, when reinforcements having arrived from France, the combined American and French armies advanced upon Yorktown, where the British commander-in-chief, Lord Cornwallis, was forced to capitulate, surrendering his entire force of 7,000 men. This event closed the war; a definitive treaty of peace being signed at Paris, September 3, 1783, in which the English Government recognized the independence of the United States.

In the December following, General Washington resigned his commission and retired into private life, from which he was again called forth, in 1787, to preside over the National Convention assembled in Philadelphia to consolidate the National Constitution and place the federal system of government upon a firm and permanent basis. This accomplished, on February 4, 1789, General Washington was elected to the presidency of the newly constituted nation, and in 1792, reelected to the same high office. The chief events which signalized his administration were the rise of the two great political parties, the Federalists and the Democrats (or Republicans), to the former of which Washington naturally belonged, both by principle and policy; and a new treaty entered into with England, in 1795, which evoked great animosity against Washington and his government on the part of the Democratic party headed by Jefferson, on account of his hostile attitude against the Jacobinism of revolutionary France. Washington declined a third nomination to the presidency, in 1796, and, after a "Farewell Address to the People of the United States," the "Father of his Country" sought his well-won repose, passing the close of his days at Mount Vernon, where he died, December 14, 1799.

Watson, John ("Ian Maclaren"), born in 1850; till 1893, Dr. Watson was known as a popular preacher and able minister, and in that year he acquired additional distinction and wider fame by writing a series of Scotch idyls for the "British Weekly," under the title of "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush" they became widely popular in the United States and Great Britain. "The Days of Auld Lang Syne," a second series of idyls, published in 1895, also reached a large circulation. A novel from Dr. Watson's pen, "Kate Carnegie and Those Ministers," was published in 1896. "The Upper Room" and "The Life of the Master" are perhaps his best known religious works. Died, 1907.

Watson, Thomas E., lawyer, ex-congressman; born in Georgia, in 1856; studied two years in Mercer College; taught school; admitted to bar, 1875; practiced in Thomson, Ga.; member Georgia Legislature, 1882-83; Democratic elector-at-large, 1888; member Congress, 1891-93, as Populist; was candidate and claims election (on honest count), at elections in 1892 and 1894, but his opponent was given the certificate; resumed practice of law, 1895. While in Congress secured first appropriation for free delivery of mails in rural districts that Congress ever passed. Nominated for vice-president of United States at St. Louis Populist Convention which endorsed Bryan for president, 1896; for some time conducted Populist paper at Atlanta. Nominated for president by People's party, 1904, and made active campaign to revive the party; began publication of "Tom Watson's Magazine," in New York, 1905. Author: "The Story of France," "Life of Thomas Jefferson," "Life of Napoleon," "Life and Times of Thomas Jefferson," "Bethany, a Study and Story of the Old South."

Watt, James, an eminent British engineer and mechanical inventor; was born at Greenock in 1736. He early developed extraordinary talents in practical mechanics, and, in 1765, perfected his grand discovery of the condensation of steam by means of an air-tight cylinder, and likewise invented an apparatus to depress the piston of an engine by steam instead of atmospheric pressure. For some years he occupied himself in the surveying and engineering of various public works in Scotland, and in 1774, entered into partnership with the Messrs. Boulton of Soho, Birmingham, for the manufacture of steam engines, perfecting numerous and great improvements in their mechanism—among others the regulator by centrifugal force, the throttle valve, the machinery of parallel motion, and the steam barometer. In 1782, he invented the double-acting engine, and retired from business in 1800. Died, 1819.

Watterson, Henry, American journalist; born in Washington, D. C., February 16, 1840. His first work as journalist was with the "Democratic Review," and "The States," in Washington, D. C. He edited the "Republican Banner," Nashville, Tenn., before and after the Civil War, in the interim serving with distinction in the Confederate Army. He edited, in Louisville, Ky., the "Louisville Journal" (1867-1868); and the Louisville "Courier-Journal" since 1868. He published "History of the Spanish-American War," "Abraham Lincoln," etc., and continues to be one of America's most brilliant journalists.

Watts, George Frederick, R. A., born in 1820; painter, gained a reputation by his "Caractacus Led in Triumph through the Streets of Rome." Among his chief works are "Fata Morgana," "Love and Death," "Time, Death, and Judgment," and portraits of Joachim, Manning, William Morris, etc. Died, 1904.

Watts, Isaac, an English dissenting minister and poet, the "very father of English hymnology," was born in 1674, and died, 1748.

Wayne, Anthony, an American general of the Revolutionary epoch; was born in Chester County, Pa., in 1745. He entered the army as a colonel, in 1775, and after serving with distinction in the Canadian campaign, commanded a division at the battle of Brandywine, and the right wing at Germantown, 1777. After distinguishing himself at Monmouth in the following year, he captured by assault the fortified works at Stony Point on the Hudson, in 1779, and received the thanks of Congress therefor. After participating in the capture of Cornwallis' army at Yorktown, 1780, he put down the Indians in Georgia, and in 1794, gained a signal victory over the Miami Indians in Ohio. Died, 1796.

Webster, Daniel, an illustrious American statesman, jurist, and orator, was born in Salisbury, N. H., in 1782, of respectable but comparatively humble parentage. After receiving his rudimentary education at Exeter and Boscawen academies, he entered Dartmouth College, in 1797, as a freshman, and after graduating in 1801, entered upon the study of the law at Salisbury and Boston, in which latter city he was called to the bar in 1805. In 1807, he went into practice at Portsmouth, and, after earning a high legal reputation, was elected by the Federal party to the lower house of Congress in 1813, where he opposed the war with England, and at once rose into prominence as an able debater. Reëlected in 1815, he shared in the discussion of the United States Bank Charter and specie payment questions. Meanwhile he had risen to the highest rank in his profession as a constitutional lawyer, and as a consummate leader in criminal causes. In 1820, he served as a member of the Convention met to revise the Constitution of Massachusetts, and in 1822, was reëlected to Congress, where, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, he rendered eminent assistance in the entire revision of the United States criminal code. In 1828, he became senator, and in 1830, in opposing the Nullification doctrine advanced by South Carolina statesmen, delivered perhaps the most splendid outburst of patriotic oratory ever heard within the Congress of the American Union. In 1834, Webster became a prominent leader of the Whig party, and, in 1841, was appointed secretary of state under President Harrison, retaining the office during Tyler's chief magistracy, and again under Fillmore, in 1850. The most remarkable event of his official term was the so-called Ashburton Treaty with England, in the settlement of the northeastern boundary question. Reëlected to the senate in 1844, he opposed alike the admission of Texas into the Union and the prosecution of the war with Mexico, and supported Henry Clay's "Compromise Measures" of 1850, in relation to the extension of slavery to new territories. In 1850, he was unsuccessfully nominated for the presidency by the National Whig Convention of 1852. Died, October 24, in the latter year.

Webster, Noah, author and philologist; born in Hartford, Conn., in 1758, and educated at Yale College. He was admitted to the bar in 1781, but engaged in scholastic and literary occupations. Employed in teaching a school at Goshen, N. Y., he prepared his "Grammatical Institutes of the English Language," published in three parts, and edited "Governor Winthrop's Journal." In 1785, he wrote "Sketches of American Policy," advocating the formation of a new constitution, and gave public lectures on the English language, which were published 1789. In 1807, he published "A Philosophical and Practical Grammar of the English Language," and commenced his American "Dictionary of the English Language," but finding difficulties in etymology, he devoted ten years to its study, and prepared a "Synopsis of Words in Twenty Languages," then began his dictionary anew, and, in seven years, completed it. His "Elementary Spelling-Book," founded on his "Institutes," up to 1862, had been sold to the extent of 41,000,000 copies. A new and thoroughly revised and enlarged edition of his dictionary was finished in 1890, and it is now one of the most complete dictionaries of the English language published. Mr. Webster also published a popular "History of the United States," and a "Manual of Useful Studies." He was a judge and a member of the State Legislature, and one of the founders of Amherst College. Died in New Haven in 1843.

Welch, William Henry, professor of pathology at Johns Hopkins; born in Norfolk, Conn., April 8, 1850; graduate of Yale, A. B., 1870; M. D., College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, 1875 (LL. D., Western Reserve, 1894; Yale, 1896; Harvard, 1900; Toronto, 1903; Columbia, 1904). Author: "General Pathology of Fever"; also numerous papers on pathological, and bacteriological subjects.

Wellington, Arthur Wellesley [Wesley], Duke of, was born 1769, was educated at Eton and the Military Academy of Angers, and entered the army in 1787. As lieutenant-colonel he served in Holland (1794), and in 1797 was sent to India. In 1799, under General Harris, he stormed Seringapatam, defeated the Mahrattas at Assaye in 1803, and returned home two years later. After serving at Copenhagen (1806), and sitting in parliament for two years (being Irish secretary in 1807), he was sent to Portugal in 1808. Having won the victories of Rolçia and Vimiera, he was superseded, but in 1809 was again in the Peninsula. He was made a peer for the victory of Talavera, and won the battle of Busaco in 1810, after which he constructed the lines of Torres Vedras. This was followed by Fuentes d' Oñoro (1811), the capture of Ciudad Rodrigo and Badajoz (1812), and the victory of Salamanca in the same year. He was now created marquis, and after the battle of Vittoria drove the French across the Pyrenees. After being made field-marshal and duke, he attended the Congress of Vienna, which he left to meet Napoleon at Waterloo. In 1827, he became commander-in-chief, and in 1828 was for the first time premier. After yielding on the Catholic question, he resigned in 1830 on that of Reform, incurring great unpopularity. In 1834, he again held office, but resigned next year, and in 1841 joined the cabinet of Sir R. Peel. He attended the House of Lords to the last, and received a state funeral at St. Paul's Cathedral. Died, 1852.

Wenceslas, or Wenzel (ven'-tsel), a German emperor, of the house of Luxemburg, born in Nuremberg in 1361. He was the eldest son of Charles IV., was crowned King of Bohemia in his third year, and in 1378 succeeded his father as emperor. He annulled all debts due to Jews on the payment to himself of fifteen to thirty per cent. of the amount. The mob of Prague having slaughtered 3,000 Jews, he appropriated their property. In 1394, he was imprisoned at Prague by a conspiracy among the nobles, headed by Jodocus of Moravia, but the German princes secured his release. He joined France in urging the abdication of Boniface IX. and Benedict XIII., in order that a new pope might take their place. Hereupon several German princes deposed him in 1400, electing Rupert of the Palatinate. He abdicated his claims to the imperial crown in favor of his brother Sigismund in 1410, and indulged in excesses till he died of apoplexy. Died, 1419.

Wesley, John, was born at Epworth, in Lincolnshire, June 17, 1703; an eminent evangelist and divine, the founder of "the people called Methodists." He was the son of a clergyman of the Church of England; and he became himself a clergyman, after having been educated at the Charterhouse School, and at Christ Church, Oxford. The year after he took orders (1725) he was chosen a Fellow of Lincoln College, and was appointed lecturer on Greek; but shortly afterwards he became curate to his father, and labored at Epworth and in the neighborhood, where his father was vicar, till he returned to Oxford in 1729. It was during his residence at Oxford that the first Methodist Society was formed, he and his brother Charles (born, 1708; died, 1788), being accustomed to meet together, with a few others, for the purpose of mutual edification. Wesley continued to act as tutor at Oxford till 1735, when he was induced to visit Georgia, in North America. After about two years he returned to England, and soon after commenced preaching in association with his friend George Whitefield, from whom, however, he separated in 1740 on account of a difference in theological belief. His labors were incessant. During fifty years he traveled all over the country everywhere preaching the gospel, and founding societies; at the same time he administered the affairs of an organization which at the time of his death embraced no fewer than 80,000 members; and during the whole period he was a very copious writer—his works, when first collected, amounting to no fewer than thirty-two volumes. During the whole of his career he continued still, professedly, a minister of the Church of England. Wesley died in the house adjoining his chapel in the City Road, London, and in the adjoining graveyard he was buried. His brother Charles, who died three years before him, is chiefly celebrated as the author of numerous hymns, some of which are considered among the best in the language. Died, 1791.

West, Benjamin, was born at Springfield, Pennsylvania, October 10, 1738; an eminent painter, who settled in England in 1763, and in 1792 succeeded Sir Joshua Reynolds as President of the Royal Academy, an office which he held until his death. His works were formerly very highly esteemed, and he is still considered one of the greatest painters whom America has produced. He is buried in St. Paul's Cathedral. Died in London, 1820.

Westcott, Brooke Foss, D. D., was born near Birmingham, England, in January, 1825, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. He obtained the Norrisian Prize in 1850, and was ordained deacon and priest in the following year. He was elected Fellow of his college in 1849, and proceeded M. A. in 1851, B. D. in 1865, and D. D. in 1870. Doctor Westcott received from Oxford University the honorary degree of D. C. L. in 1881 and that of D. D. from Edinburgh University at its tercentenary commemoration in 1883. He was elected regius professor of divinity at Cambridge, November 1, 1870, and, on the retirement of Doctor Jeremie, Doctor Westcott was nominated honorary chaplain to the queen in 1875, and a chaplain in ordinary in 1879. In May, 1881, was published, under the title "The New Testament in Greek," the result of the twenty-eight years' joint labor of Doctors Westcott and Hort upon the Greek text. In October, 1883, he was nominated to the canonry of Westminster, vacated by Canon Barry, bishop designate of Sydney, Australia. He was one of the company for the revision of the authorized version of the New Testament. Died, 1901.

Westinghouse, George, inventor and manufacturer; born in New York in 1846; educated in public and high schools; spent much time in his father's machine shop, inventing, at 15, a rotary engine. Served in Union army, 1863-64; assistant engineer in United States Navy, 1864-65; then attended Union College to sophomore year (Ph. D., 1890). Invented, 1865, a device for replacing railroad cars on the track; invented and successfully introduced, 1868, the Westinghouse air brake, which he has since greatly improved; has also made other inventions in railway signals, steam and gas engines, steam turbines, and electric machinery. Was pioneer, against great opposition, in introducing alternating current machinery in America, which has rendered possible the great development of water powers for long distance, electrical transmission; built the great generators at Niagara Falls and those for elevated railway and rapid transit system in New York; has established large works in United States, England, France, and Germany for manufacturing air brakes, electrical and steam machinery; president of numerous corporations, employing over 20,000 people and with a capitalization of about $75,000,000. His inventions of the air brake and of automatic railway signals have been largely instrumental in the possibility and safety of modern high-speed railroading.

Whately, Richard, was born in London, February 1, 1787; an eminent prelate, theologian, and mental and moral philosopher; from 1831 to his death archbishop of Dublin. In 1822, he was made Bampton lecturer, and in that capacity preached his sermons on "The Use and Abuse of Party Feeling in Religion." In 1825, he became principal of St. Alban's Hall, Oxford; and four years later was appointed professor of political economy, an office which he held till his appointment to the archbishopric. Whately's intellectual activity was remarkable. In 1821, he wrote "Historical Doubts Relative to Napoleon Bonaparte," a logical satire upon historical scepticism; in 1826 he published in a separate form his admirable treatises on "Logic and Rhetoric," both of which had already appeared in the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana"; and in 1856-59 he published his annotated editions of Bacon's "Essays" and Paley's "Moral Philosophy," both admirable specimens of criticism, and full of interesting original discourse. Died in Dublin, 1863.

Wheatstone, Sir Charles, was born at Gloucester, 1802; an eminent electrician and physicist, for many years professor of natural philosophy in King's College, London. He was the first to introduce and to give practical application to the electric telegraph in England, his experiments having been made, in conjunction with Mr. Cooke, when he was quite unaware of the experiments being made about the same time by Professor Morse in America. He was also the inventor of the stereoscope. He received his knighthood in 1858, and was for some years a vice-president of the Royal Society, of which he had been elected a Fellow in 1836. He twice received the Royal Medal at the Royal Society, and in 1848 won the Copley Medal. Died, 1875.

Wheeler, Joseph, an American military officer; born in Augusta, Ga., September 10, 1836; was graduated at the United States Military Academy in 1859; served in the cavalry till the outbreak of the Civil War, when he entered the Confederate army, in which he was commissioned major-general and senior commander of cavalry. He won great distinction during the Civil War as a raider. After the war he entered the law profession; held a seat in Congress in 1881-1899; and was made major-general of volunteers in May, 1898. During the Santiago campaign in Cuba he commanded the cavalry division; participated in the battles of Las Guasimas and San Juan Hill; was appointed senior member of the commission to make arrangements for the surrender of the Spanish army; served in the Philippines as commander of the 1st brigade, 2d division, from August, 1899, to January, 1900; was appointed a brigadier-general, U. S. A., June 16, 1900, and was retired on September 10, following. Died, 1906.

Whewell, William, (hu'el), was born at Lancaster, 1794; an eminent writer on many various subjects; from 1841 to his death Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1833 he published his Bridgewater Treatise, on "Astronomy and General Physics Considered in Reference to Natural Theology"; and this was followed by a "History of the Inductive Sciences" (1837), and "The Philosophy of the Inductive Sciences" (1840), "Lectures on Political Economy" (1861), undoubtedly his three greatest works, displaying equal learning and independent power. His other writings are too numerous to mention. His death was caused by injuries which he sustained through a fall while riding. Died, 1866.

Whipple, Edwin Percy, author, born in Gloucester, Mass., March 8, 1819. He attended the public schools at Salem in 1837, and later was appointed superintendent of the newsroom of the Merchant's Exchange in Boston. Following this he wrote for the "Boston Miscellany" and other magazines, and lectured in Boston and other cities. In 1872, he became literary editor of the "Boston Globe," in 1877, wrote for the "North American Review," and at the same time did considerable bookseller's jobwork. His publications are numerous and, were followed by several posthumous publications. Died, in Boston, Mass., 1886.

Whistler, James Abbott McNeill, painter, born in Lowell, Mass., in 1834; was educated at the United States Military Academy, studied drawing and painting in Paris, France, and in 1863 settled in London, England. He held original views concerning his art, and made interesting experiments with color, in quest of novel effects. He also gained celebrity as an etcher, and is the author of etchings and paintings of established reputation and worth. His paintings include many portraits, among which are "The White Girl," "Portrait of my Mother," "Nocturne in Blue and Gold," "Harmony in Gray and Green," etc. In 1890, he wrote the "Gentle Art of Making Enemies." Died in London, 1903.

William I., surnamed the Conqueror, King of England, founder of the Norman Dynasty, was born, 1027. He was the bastard son of Robert I. or II., Duke of Normandy, and a tanner's daughter of Falaise named Arletta, and succeeded to the dukedom when eight years old. He claimed the throne of England through Emma, sister of his grandfather and mother of Edward the Confessor. When Harold, son of Earl Godwin, visited the Norman court in 1065, he was compelled to swear fealty to William; but on Edward's death, in 1066, Harold procured his own elevation to the throne. William then prepared to enforce his pretension by arms, and on September 28, 1066, landed at Pevensey with 60,000 men. On October 14th was fought the battle of Senlac or Hastings, in which the Saxons were defeated and their king was slain. William was crowned in London, December 25th. At first his rule was mild and just, but after the sanguinary suppression of a league of the Saxon nobles he treated the Saxons as a conquered nation, distributed their estates among his Norman followers, and deposed the principal Saxon clergy. He was long at war for his continental possessions with his rebellious son Robert Courthose, and most of the latter part of his reign was passed in Normandy. His last dispute was with the King of France, some of whose vassals had plundered Norman territory. In retaliation he burned Nantes. While riding over the ruins, he was ruptured by the plunging of his horse, which caused his death several weeks after. Died, 1087.

At an early age he began the study of military affairs; took part in the campaign of 1813-14 under Blücher; married in 1829 Princess Augusta of Saxe-Weimar; became heir-presumptive to the throne of Prussia on his father's death in 1840; was commander of the forces which suppressed the revolutionary movement (1849) in Baden; created regent in 1858, and on the death of the king, his brother, in 1861 he succeeded to the throne of Prussia. During his reign Prussia defeated Denmark (1864), annexing the duchies of Schleswig-Holstein; quarreled with Austria, and engaged in a campaign which ended in the victory of Sadowa (1866); and went with the rest of Germany to war with France in 1870 (see Germany and France). In this war the operations of the Prussian generals were under the personal supervision of the king. It was at Versailles, during the siege of Paris (January 18, 1871), that he was proclaimed German Emperor. Died, 1888.

William II., or Friedrich Wilhelm Victor Albrecht, King of Prussia and German Emperor, eldest son of Frederick III. and Victoria, princess Royal of England, was born January 27, 1859; educated at Cassel and Bonn, married Augusta Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein-Augustenburg in 1881, and succeeded his father, June 15, 1888. Since his accession he has taken considerable interest in social questions, and the strong initiative which he had adopted in political affairs brought about the dismissal of Prince Bismarck in 1890. His independence, ability, and aggressiveness have placed Germany in the foremost rank of the enlightened world powers. In 1907, he spoke of the German nation as "the block of granite upon which the Lord our God can build up and complete His work of civilizing the world." Early in 1908, he established a winter residence on the Island of Corfu.

William III. of England, born in 1650, having married Mary, daughter of James II., was regarded as a Protestant reserve against the latter, and, in 1688, was Zeller, Eduard, born in 1814; German philosopher; having held chairs at Marburg and Heidelberg, was appointed professor at Berlin, in 1872. His chief works are "History of Greek Philosophy" (of which an English version appeared in 1881), "History of German Philosophy since Leibnitz," "The Contents and Origin of the Acts of the Apostles," and studies of Strauss and Renan.

Ze'no, a Greek philosopher, of Elea (Velia), in Italy, who lived in the Fifth Century before Christ. He was one of the reputed founders of the Eleatic school of philosophy. Only fragments of his writings have come down to us.

Ze'no, a Greek philosopher, who flourished in the Third Century before Christ. He was a native of Citium, in the island of Cyprus, but most of his life was spent in Athens. He was the founder of the Stoic school of philosophy, a name derived from the Painted Porch (Stoa Poikile), in which he was accustomed to meet his disciples. He is said to have lived to the age of 98 years.

Zenobia, Queen of Palmyra (Third Century), married Odenathus, who was named "Augustus" by Gallienus in 264, and on his death, three years later, reigned alone; but in 272 Aurelian invaded her territories, defeated and captured her and took her to Rome in 274.

Zinzendorf, Nicolaus von Graf, born in 1700; founder of the Moravian settlement at Herrnhut; traveled much in America for religious purposes, and in 1737, met John Wesley in London. Died, 1760.

Zola, Emile, born in 1840; French novelist of the "naturalist" school, began life as an employé of the Hachette firm, but in 1863 published "Contes à Ninon." Among his chief works are "Thérèse Raquin," "Les Rougon Macquart," a series of which "L'Assommoir" and "Nana, Germinal La Terre," "La Bête Humaine," "La Débâcle," etc., are the most striking. Died, 1902.

Zoroaster, an ancient philosopher, of whose history little or nothing that is authentic is known. There are supposed to have been several of the name. The most celebrated, however, the Zerdusht of the Persians, is believed to have been the reformer of the Magian system of religion, and the author of the Zendavesta, which contains the doctrines that he taught. Irreconcilable differences exist among the learned as to the time in which he flourished. Volney fixes his birth 1250 B. C.

Zwingle, or Zwingli, Ulrich, born in 1484; Swiss reformer; served in Italy as a soldier, visited Erasmus at Basel, in 1514, and two years later at the monastery of Einsiedlen began to preach freely. In 1519, he was appointed to the cathedral at Zürich, having previously opposed the sale of indulgences by Sansom. Attempts were made to prohibit his preaching, but the reformation grew at Zürich. In 1529, Zwingle met Luther and Melancthon at Marburg, but two years later he fell in the battle of Kappel in the war with Berne. Died, 1531.

GEOGRAPHY, TRAVEL, ARCHITECTURE

TAJ MAHAL—SHRINE OF NUR JEHAN, "LIGHT OF THE WORLD"

GEOGRAPHY, TRAVEL, ARCHITECTURE

Africa (af're-kah), the second largest of the continents of the Old World lies nearly due south of Europe and southwest of Asia. It is of a compact form, being nearly equal at its extreme points in length and breadth. The north section of the continent, however, has an average breadth of nearly double the south. This great change of form arises mostly from the greater projection of the upper part toward the west, and the transition on this side from the broad to the narrow section is effected suddenly by an inward turn of the west coast, which faces south for nearly 20° of longitude, forming the Gulf of Guinea, the greatest indentation of the coast. Africa is united to Asia at its northeast extremity by the Isthmus of Suez, now crossed by a great ship canal. From this point the coast runs in a westerly and somewhat northerly direction to the Strait of Gibraltar, the point of greatest proximity to Europe. This north coast forms the south shore of the Mediterranean Sea, and brings all the north countries of Africa into close proximity with the European and Asiatic countries lying contiguous to that great ocean highway, which formed the chief medium of communication between the principal divisions of the ancient world.

The center of Africa possesses an exuberant tropical vegetation. The open pastoral belt at the extremities of the tropics is distinguished by a rich and varied flora. A special characteristic of the vegetation of the south extremity of Africa is the remarkable variety, size, and beauty of the heaths, some of which grow to twelve or fifteen feet in the fertile parts of Nubia.

The fauna of Africa is extensive and varied, and numerous species of mammals are peculiar to the continent. According to a common view of the geographical distribution of animals, the north of Africa belongs to the Mediterranean sub-region, while the rest of the continent forms the Ethiopian region. Africa possesses numerous species of the order quadrumana (apes and monkeys), most of which are peculiar to it. They abound especially in the tropics. The most remarkable are the chimpanzee and the gorilla. The lion is the typical carnivore of Africa. Latterly he has been driven from the coast settlements to the interior, where he still reigns king of the forest. There are three varieties, the Barbary, Senegal, and Cape lions. The leopard and panther rank next to the lion among carnivora. Hyenas of more than one species, and jackals, are found all over Africa. Elephants in large herds abound in the forests of the tropical regions, and their tusks form a principal article of commerce. These are larger and heavier than those of Asiatic elephants. The elephant is not a domestic animal in Africa as it is in Asia. The rhinoceros is found, like the elephant, in Middle and Southern Africa. Hippopotami abound in many of the large rivers and the lakes. The zebra and quagga used to abound in Central and Southern Africa, but the latter is said to be now entirely extinct. Of antelopes, the most numerous and characteristic of the ruminating animals of Africa, at least fifty species are considered peculiar to this continent, of which twenty-three used to occur in Cape Colony. The giraffe is found in the interior, and is exclusively an African animal. Several species of wild buffaloes have been found in the interior, and the buffalo has been naturalized in the north. The camel, common in the north as a beast of burden, has no doubt been introduced from Asia. The horse and the ass are natives of Barbary. The cattle of Abyssinia and Bornu have horns of immense size, but extremely light. In Barbary and the Cape of Good Hope the sheep are broad-tailed; in Egypt and Nubia they are long-legged and short-tailed. Goats are in some parts more numerous than sheep. The ibex breed extends to Abyssinia. Dogs are numerous, but cats rare, in Egypt and Barbary.

There is a marked distinction between the races in the north and east of the great desert and those in the central Soudan and the rest of Africa and the south. The main elements of the population of North Africa, including Egypt and Abyssinia, are Hamitic and Semitic, but in the north the Hamite Berbers are mingled with peoples of the same race as those of prehistoric Southern Europe, and other types of various origins, and in the east and southeast with the peoples of the negro type. The Semitic Arabs are found all over the north region, and even in the Western Sahara and Central Soudan, and far down the east coast, as traders. The Somalis and Gallas are mainly Hamitic. In the Central Soudan and the whole of the country between the desert and the Gulf of Guinea the population is pure negro—people of the black, flat- or broad-nosed, thick-lipped type, with narrow heads, woolly hair, high cheek-bones, and prognathous jaws. Scattered among them are peoples of a probably Hamitic stock. Nearly the whole of the narrow south section of Africa is inhabited by what are known as the Bantu races, of which the Zulu or Kaffir may be taken as the type. The languages of the Bantu peoples are all of the same structure, even though the physical type vary, some resembling the true negro, and others having prominent noses and comparatively thin lips. The Bushmen of South Africa are of a different type from the Bantu, probably the remains of an aboriginal population, while the Hottentots are apparently a mixture of Bushmen and Kaffirs. Scattered over Central Africa, mainly in the forest regions, are pigmy tribes, who are generally supposed to be the remains of an aboriginal population. The bulk of the inhabitants of Madagascar are of Malay affinities. The total population is estimated at about 150,000,000.

POLITICAL DIVISIONS. Only two independent governments exist in Africa, Abyssinia and Liberia. With these two exceptions, the whole continent is subject to European domination. By recent arrangements, mainly since 1884, great areas in Africa have been allotted to Great Britain, France, Germany, Portugal, Belgium, and Italy, as coming within their respective spheres of influence, in addition to colonial possessions proper. The following table exhibits the present division of Africa among the European powers:

	AREA	POPULATION
BRITISH AFRICA: Basutoland, Bechuanaland Protectorate, Cape Colony, Central Africa, East Africa Protectorate, Uganda Protectorate, Zanzibar Protectorate, Mauritius, Natal, Niger Coast Protectorate, Territory of the Royal Niger Co., South Africa, West Africa, Zululand and Islands, and the Boer colonies,*	2,807,760	43,495,754
FRENCH AFRICA: Algeria, Senegal, French Soudan and the Niger, Gaboon and Guinea Coast, Congo Region, Somali Coast, Madagascar and Islands,	1,232,454	18,073,890
GERMAN AFRICA: Togoland, Cameroons, South West Africa, East Africa,	920,920	10,200,000
ITALIAN AFRICA: Eritrea, Somaliland,	278,500	850,000
PORTUGUESE AFRICA: Angola, the Congo, Guinea, East Africa, and Islands,	735,304	4,431,970
SPANISH AFRICA: Rio de Oro, Adrar, Fernando Po, and Islands,	243,877	136,000
TURKISH AFRICA: Tripoli and the Mediterranean Coast, Egypt,*	798,738	8,117,265
CONGO INDEPENDENT STATE. (Under the sovereignty of the King of the Belgians),	900,000	30,000,000
Total,	8,087,553	117,104,871

* Egypt and the Egyptian Soudan, although nominally under the suzerainty of Turkey, are really controlled by Great Britain, and it is only a matter of time as to when they will be incorporated into the British Empire. Adding Egypt and the Soudan to the Empire would increase the figures above given to 3,207,700 square miles and 50,316,019 population.

The remaining territory of Africa unoccupied is a part of the Great Desert of Sahara and the Independent States of Abyssinia and Liberia. Even this territory, except the last, is destined to pass under the power of the Europeans.

Over a great part of the continent civilization is at a low ebb, and in the Congo region cannibalism is extensively prevalent. Yet in various regions the natives who have not come in contact with a higher civilization show considerable skill in agriculture and various mechanical arts, as in weaving and metal working. Among articles exported from Africa are gold and diamonds, palm oil, ivory, wool, ostrich feathers, esparto, cotton, caoutchouc, etc. The total annual trade has been estimated at $500,000,000.

Alaska is now an organized Territory in the Western Division of the North American Union, comprising the extreme northwestern part of the American continent; bounded by the Arctic and Pacific Oceans, Bering Sea, British Columbia, and the Northwest Territories of Canada; gross area, as far as determined, 581,107 square miles; purchased from Russia, in 1867, for $7,200,000; given a territorial district government in 1884 and enlarged political powers in 1906. The population by latest census was 63,592, but owing to gold discoveries is probably much larger now.

Gold production, and business activities connected therewith, are hastening the development of the country, and the yield of the precious metal promises to be a large factor for many years to come.

The waters of Alaska contain over 100 species of food fish, but the principal fisheries are those confined to salmon, cod, and herring. In connection with the Alaska coast there are at least 125,000 square miles of cod fishing banks, the greater part of which still awaits development. Whales and halibut also abound, but as yet they do not support distinct industries.

When the United States acquired this region, and till gold mining set in, fur sealing was the only industry. So far there has been but little done in the line of systematic farming. Congress has continued its appropriation to investigate agricultural possibilities. Oats, wheat, rye, barley, and buckwheat, among cereals; potatoes, turnips, peas, onions, and many minor vegetables; a variety of fruit and excellent hay are grown to advantage.

Algiers the capital of Algeria, founded by the Arabs in 935, called the "silver city," from the glistening white of its buildings as seen sloping up from the sea, presenting a striking appearance, was for centuries under its Bey the headquarters of piracy in the Mediterranean, which only began to cease when Lord Exmouth bombarded the town and destroyed the fleet in the harbor. Since it fell into the hands of the French the city has been greatly improved, the fortifications strengthened, and its neighborhood has become a frequent resort of English people in winter. Population, 145,000.

Alps, the greatest European mountain system, forming the watershed between the Mediterranean and the Atlantic, and the North and Black seas, extending through 14° of longitude and 5° of latitude, with spurs to the Apennines, Pyrenees, Vosges, Hartz, Sudetes, Carpathians, and the Balkan. They are of crescent-like form, and average in height about 7,700 feet; over 400 peaks rise to the perpetual snow line, which averages from 8,000 to 9,000 feet. The central point of all the Alpine chains is the St. Gothard group, which is in a direct line 150 miles from the Mediterranean, 500 miles from the North Sea, and 550 miles from the Baltic. The principal Alpine divisions are: I. The Maritime Alps, consisting of two portions, the first (Ligurian Alps) extending from the vicinity of Nice to the Col de Lauzanja in Piedmont; the second (upper Maritime Alps) terminating in Monte Viso, on the western frontier of Piedmont. II. The Cottian Alps, extending from Monte Viso to Mont Cenis, with Piedmontese and French territories on three sides. III. The Graian Alps, extending from Mont Cenis (11,755 feet) to the Col du Bonhomme, between Savoy on the west and Piedmont on the east. IV. The Pennine Alps, from the Col du Bonhomme to Monte Rosa, between Upper Savoy and the Swiss canton of Valais on one side, and Piedmont on the other, including Mont Blanc (15,780 feet), Monte Rosa (15,208), and the Matterhorn (14,705). V. The Lepontine or Helvetian Alps, including the divergent chain known as the Bernese Alps. This division covers West Switzerland, extending on both sides of the Rhône, dividing Lombardy from Switzerland, one branch terminating at Monte Bernardino, the other extending to and uniting with the Jura, north of the lake of Geneva. This comprises the finest scenery, and includes the Finsteraarhorn (14,106 feet), Furca (14,037), Jungfrau (13,718), Mönch (13,498), Schreckhorn (13,386), and Monte Leon on the Simplon (11,541). VI. The Rhaetian Alps, commencing at Monte Bernardino extending along the confines of Switzerland, Italy, and Germany, and terminating at the northeast end of Tyrol. VII. The Noric Alps, extending through Salzburg, North Carinthia, Styria, and Upper and Lower Austria; highest peak, Gross-Glockner (12,776 feet). VIII. The Carnic Alps, extending on the confines of Venetia and Carinthia, from Pellegrino to Terglou. IX. From the last-named place this chain is prolonged through Görz and Carniola, to Mt. Kleck, under the name of the Julian or Pannonian Alps. X. A southern continuation, called Dinaric Alps, extends from Mt. Kleck through Croatia, Dalmatia, and Herzegovina, to the vicinity of the Balkan. Among the most celebrated passes are those of the Great and Little St. Bernard, St. Gothard, Simplon, and Splügen. Over the Simplon Pass (6,628 feet high), Napoleon constructed a road extending from Brieg to Domo d'Ossola, forty-six and one-half miles, connecting Geneva with Milan. Railway tunnels have been cut through Mont Cenis, St. Gothard, and the Simplon. Ascents, promoted by Alpine clubs, have greatly increased in numbers and daring, despite whirlwinds, avalanches, and glaciers. The vegetation diminishes in beauty, if not in abundance, at an elevation of 1,600 to 1,700 feet, and almost disappears at 6,500 feet, though pasturage, and peculiar genera of plants distinctively known as the "Alpine flora," flourish as high as 8,500 feet. Agassiz distinguished lichen even amid the eternal snows. The fauna includes the chamois, lammergeyer, eagle, wolf, fox, lynx, wild cat, and bear. The Alps are not only remarkable for wonderful mountain masses and freaks of nature, but also for their mineralogy, and for their dairies and cattle raising.

Amazon, Maranon, or Orellana, a river which traverses nearly the whole extent of the equatorial region of South America, running chiefly from west to east, and entering the Atlantic almost at the equator. It is one of the largest rivers in the world, running a course, including windings, of nearly 4,000 miles. The force of its current is so great that it overlays the ocean to a distance of more than 200 miles from the shore. With its enormous tributaries — the Rio Negro, the Madeira, the Japura, and many others — it is estimated that it affords an inland navigation of 50,000 miles. The area drained by its waters is probably not less than 2,500,000 square miles. The width of its mouth, or mouths, is nearly 200 miles.

Amiens (äh'-me-än), an ancient city of France, in the department of Somme, about seventy miles north of Paris. Its cathedral, commenced in 1220 and finished in 1288, is a magnificent specimen of Gothic architecture, and one of the finest cathedrals in Europe. Amiens was the birthplace of Peter the Hermit. It is chiefly celebrated for the Treaty of Peace, between Great Britain, France, Spain, and Holland, which was signed at Amiens, March 27, 1802. During the war between France and Germany, in 1870, Amiens was taken by the Germans under General Manteuffel, an event which contributed to the subsequent fall of Paris. Amiens has many important manufactures, including cotton-velvets, kerseymeres, etc. Population, 92,065.

Amsterdam, the metropolis of the Netherlands, in the province of North Holland, on the river Amstel, is divided into small islands, connected by bridges, and is almost wholly built upon piles. The site of Amsterdam was originally a peat-bog. About A. D. 1200 it was a small fishing village. It was formerly very strongly fortified, but now its only defense consists in its sluices, which can flood in a few hours the surrounding land. The approach to the city from the Zuyder Zee is intricate and dangerous, owing to the numerous shallows. In the Seventeenth Century Amsterdam was the center of the banking transactions of the world. It is still the chief commercial city of the Netherlands, and has a large trade with both the East and the West Indies. The diamond-cutters of Amsterdam are greatly celebrated. Population, 557,614.

Andes, the great mountain system of South America, extends along its west coast from Cape Horn to the Isthmus of Panama, with a breadth of from forty to four hundred miles, and covers with its offshoots, plateaux, and declivities, nearly a sixth part of that continent. The highest summit is Aconcagua, in Chile, 23,910 feet high. The Andes are composed partly of granite, gneiss, mica, and clay slate, but chiefly of greenstone, porphyry, and basalt, with limestone, red sandstone, and conglomerate. Volcanoes are numerous in the Chilean Andes, where there are no less than nineteen in a state of activity; and the mountains of Ecuador consist almost altogether of volcanic summits, either now or formerly in active ignition. Of these, the most dreaded is Cotopaxi. The Andes are celebrated for their mineral riches — producing gold and silver in large quantities, with platina, mercury, copper, lead, tin, and iron. The limit of perpetual snow in the Andes reaches the height of 18,300 feet in the West Cordillera of Chile; near the equator it is 15,000 feet. The potato is cultivated at an elevation of 9,800 to 13,000 feet; wheat grows luxuriantly at 10,000 feet, and oats ripen in the vicinity of Lake Titicaca at an elevation of 12,795 feet.

Antioch, a city of Syria, in the eyalet of Aleppo, on the left bank of the Asi, formerly the Orontes. It derived its name from Antiochus, a distinguished officer in the service of Philip of Macedon, and was one of the sixteen cities built by his son, Seleucus Nicator. Antioch was a city of great magnificence. It was the residence of the Syrian monarchs, and is said to have been then one of the largest cities in the world. In Roman times, it was the seat of the Syrian governor, and the center of a widely-extended commerce. It now exhibits scarcely any traces of its former grandeur, except the ruins of the walls built by Justinian, and of a fortress erected by the Crusaders. The modern name is Antakieh. Population, about 28,000.

Antwerp (Dutch and German Antwerpen, French Anvers), the chief port of Belgium, and the capital of a province of the same name, on the Scheldt, about fifty miles from the open sea. It is strongly fortified, being completely surrounded on the land side by a semicircular inner line of fortifications, the defenses being completed by an outer line of forts and outworks. The cathedral, with a spire 400 feet high, one of the largest and most beautiful specimens of Gothic architecture in Belgium, contains Rubens's celebrated masterpieces, the Descent from the Cross, the Elevation of the Cross, and The Assumption. The other churches of note are St. James's, St. Andrew's, and St. Paul's, all enriched with paintings by Rubens, Vandyck, and other masters. Among the other edifices of note are the exchange, the town-hall, the palace, theater, academy of the fine arts, picture and sculpture galleries, etc. The harbor accommodation is extensive and excellent, new docks and quays having been built in the past few years. The shipping trade has greatly advanced in recent times, and is now very large, the goods being largely in transit. There are numerous and varied industries. Antwerp is mentioned as early as the Eighth Century, and in the Eleventh and Twelfth it had attained a high degree of prosperity. In the Sixteenth Century it is said to have had a population of 200,000. The wars between the Netherlands and Spain greatly injured its commerce, which was almost ruined by the closing of the navigation of the Scheldt in accordance with the peace of Westphalia (1648). It was only in the Nineteenth Century that its prosperity had revived, and it is now one of the important active seaports of Western Europe. Population, 304,951.

Aqueduct (Lat. aqua, water, duco, to lead), an artificial channel or conduit for the conveyance of water from one place to another: more particularly applied to structures for conveying water from distant sources for the supply of large cities. Aqueducts were extensively used by the Romans, and many of them still remain in different places on the Continent of Europe.

The following are the names of the Roman aqueducts, chronologically arranged:

1. The Aqua Appia, begun by and named after the censor Appius Claudius about 313 B. C. It ran a course of between six and seven miles, its source being in the neighborhood of Palestrina. With the exception of a small portion near the Porta Capena, it was subterranean. No remains of it exist.

2. Anio Vetus, constructed about 273 B. C. by M. Curius Dentatus. It also was chiefly underground. Remains may be traced both at Tivoli and near the Porta Maggiore. From the point at which it quitted the river Anio, about twenty miles above Tivoli, to Rome, is about forty-three miles.

3. Aqua Marcia, named after the prætor Quintus Marcius Rex, 145 B. C., had its source between Tivoli and Subiaco, and was consequently about sixty miles long. The noble arches which stretch across the Campagna for some six miles on the road to Frascati, are the portion of this aqueduct which was above ground.

4. Aqua Tepula (126 B. C.) had its source near Tusculum, and its channel was carried over the arches of the last-mentioned aqueduct.

5. Aqua Julia, constructed by Agrippa, and named after Augustus, 34 B. C. Like the Tepulan, it was carried along the Marcian arches, and its source was also near Tusculum. Remains of the three last-mentioned aqueducts still exist.

6. Aqua Virgo, also constructed by Agrippa, and said to have been named in consequence of the spring which supplied it having been pointed out by a girl to some of Agrippa's soldiers when in search of water. The Aqua Vergine, as it is now called, is still entire, having been restored by the popes Nicholas V. and Pius IV., 1568. The source of the Aqua Virgo is near the Anio, in the neighborhood of Torre Salona, on the Via Collatina, and about fourteen miles from Rome. The original object of this aqueduct was to supply the baths of Agrippa; its water now flows in the Fontana Trevi, that of the Piazza Navona, the Piazza Farnese, and the Barcaccia of the Piazza di Spagna. The water of the Aqua Virgo is the best in Rome.

7. Aqua Alsietina, constructed by Augustus, and afterwards restored by Trajan, and latterly by the popes. This aqueduct, now called the Aqua Paolo, is situated on the right bank of the Tiber, and supplies the fountains in front of St. Peter's and the Fontana Paola on the Montorio. Its original object was to supply the Naumachia of Augustus which was a sheet of water for the representation of sea fights.

8. Aqua Claudia, commenced by Caligula and completed by Claudius, 51 A. D. A line of magnificent arches which formerly belonged to this aqueduct still stretches across the Campagna, and forms one of the grandest of Roman ruins. It was used as a quarry by Sextus V. for the construction of the Aqua Felici, which now supplies the Fountain of Termini, and various others in different parts of the city.

9. Anio Novus, which was the most copious of all the Roman fountains, though inferior to the Marcia in the solidity of its structure; it was also the longest of the aqueducts, pursuing a course of no less than sixty-two miles. By the two last-mentioned aqueducts the former supply of water was doubled. In addition to the aqueducts already mentioned, there was the Aqua Trajana, which may, however, be regarded as a branch of the Anio Novus and several others of later construction, such as the Antoniana, Alexandrina, and Jovia, none of which were to be compared with the older ones in extent and magnificence.

Other great aqueducts were built in other parts of the Roman Empire. One of the most perfect was that of Nîmes, including the bridge spanning the valley of the river Gard, and now known as the Pont du Gard. In the reign of Louis XIV. a magnificent aqueduct was constructed for supplying Versailles. The bridge of Maintenon over which it is carried is seven-eighths of a mile long, upward of 200 feet high, and contains three tiers of arches, 242 in each tier, with fifty feet span.

The new Croton aqueduct of New York is the finest of modern times. The old Croton was completed in 1842, having been five years in building. The whole expense, including $1,800,000 for distributing pipes, right of way, and other outlays, was $10,375,000; including commissions and interest, the cost was $12,500,000. Its length, from its source at the Croton River to the distributing reservoir on Fifth Avenue and 40th Street, is forty and a half miles. It is carried through sixteen tunnels, having an aggregate length of 6,841 feet, cut mainly through gneiss rock. A large part of the open cutting is also rock work. A dam across the Croton River raised the water forty feet and formed the Croton Lake, which covers about 400 acres. From the dam to the Harlem River, nearly thirty-three miles, the aqueduct is of stone, brick, and cement arched over and under, except in the rock tunnels where the roofing arch is dispensed with. Its capacity is 115,000,000 gallons daily. The new Croton aqueduct was completed in 1890 at a cost of $20,000,000, and, together with that of Vienna, is the most important of modern times.

Aquitania, the Roman name of a part of Gaul, originally including the country between the Pyrenees and Garonne, but afterwards enlarged by the Emperor Augustus, when he divided Gaul into four provinces, by the addition to it of the country between the Garonne and the Loire (A. D. 27). From 1152 to 1451 Aquitaine was, except for several brief periods, an English possession. It afterwards was named Guienne, and now forms the departments of Gironde and Lot-et-Garonne.

Architecture (ar'-kī-tekt-yur), the art of building, embracing every kind of structure except works of defense and ships. Throughout the globe remains of edifices proclaim an early possession of certain degrees of architectural knowledge. The most remarkable vestiges of these primitive structures, save the Celtic monuments, were once supposed to be the works of giants or Cyclops like those mentioned in the Odyssey. By whom they were erected, however, is unknown, though they have been attributed to the Pelasgians. The walls of the cities and of the sacred enclosures and tombs were composed of blocks of stone of a polygonal form well adjusted. No cement was used, the interstices being filled with small stones. At times they present horizontal layers whose upright joints are variously inclined. At Mycenæ and Tiryns several examples are to be found. No entire architectural monument has come down to us from Babylon or Nineveh, nor from the Phenicians, the Hebrews, the Syrians, the Philistines, and many other nations. Of the very ancient Chinese monuments, too, we have no trace. Japan, Siam, and the islands of the Indian Ocean abound in ancient ruins once sacred to the divinities of the Buddhist faith. The Hindoo structures are remarkable for their colossal size and their severe and grotesque appearance.—The architectural types of all other structures of antiquity sink into insignificance when compared with those of the Egyptians.

Their earliest works are the hypogea or spea, wherein their dead were interred, and which served also as subterranean temples. These were the prototypes of the open-air temples, of which the most ancient example is perhaps that at Amada. The plan is very similar to that of the hypogea, or caves. The walls, ceilings, and columns were decorated with figures in bas-relief and hieroglyphics richly colored, generally with yellow, red, green, and blue. The palaces were constructed upon a plan very similar to that of the temples. Besides their wonderful cities of the dead, the Egyptians reared their stupendous pyramids, the most gigantic monuments existing. The pyramidal shape pervades most of their works, the walls of their temples inclining inward. Columns were employed to form porticoes to their interior courts, and also to support the ceilings. The shafts, of different forms, being conical, or cylindrical, or bulging out at the base, sometimes presented a smooth surface; they were rarely fluted, and generally covered with hieroglyphics. The capitals resemble the lotus, either spreading out at the top or bound together, assuming the bulbous shape; above is a square tablet forming the abacus.—The Grecian monuments belonged to the states, and upon the public works the governments lavished fabulous sums. Hence the Grecian cities were adorned with temples, theaters, odeons, gymnasiums, choragic monuments, and the like.

The earliest architectural remains of Greece are of unknown antiquity, and consist of massive walls built of huge blocks of stone. In historic times the Greeks developed an architecture of noble simplicity and dignity. This style is of modern origin compared with that of Egypt, and the earliest remains give indications that it was in part derived from the Egyptians. It is considered to have attained its greatest perfection in the age of Pericles, or about 460–430 B. C. The great masters of this period were Phidias, Ictinus, Callicrates, etc. All the extant buildings are more or less in ruins. The style is characterized by beauty, harmony, and simplicity in the highest degree. Distinctive of it are what are called the orders of architecture, by which term are understood certain modes of proportioning and decorating the column and its superimposed entablature. The Greeks had three orders, called respectively the Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian. Greek buildings were abundantly adorned with sculptures, and painting was extensively used, the details of the structures being enriched by different colors or tints. Lowness of roofs and the absence of arches were distinctive features of Greek architecture, in which, as in that of Egypt, horizontality of line is another characteristic mark. The most remarkable public edifices of the Greeks were temples, of which the most famous is the Parthenon at Athens. Others exist in various parts of Greece as well as in Sicily, Southern Italy, Asia Minor, etc., where important Greek communities were early settled. Their theaters were semi-circular on one side and square on the other, the semi-circular part being usually excavated in the side of some convenient hill. This part, the auditorium, was filled with concentric seats, and might be capable of containing 20,000 spectators. A number exist in Greece, Sicily, and Asia Minor, and elsewhere. No remains of private houses are known to exist. By the end of the Peloponnesian War (say 400 B. C.) the best period of Greek architecture was over; a noble simplicity had given place to excess of ornament. After the death of Alexander the Great (323) the decline was still more marked.

Among the Romans there was no original development of architecture as among the Greeks, though they early took the foremost place in the construction of such works as aqueducts and sewers, the arch being in early and extensive use among this people. As a fine art, however, Roman architecture had its origin in copies of the Greek models, all the Grecian orders being introduced into Rome, and variously modified. Their number, moreover, was augmented by the addition of two new orders—the Tuscan and the Composite. The Romans became acquainted with the architecture of the Greeks soon after 200 B. C., but it was not till about two centuries later that the architecture of Rome attained (under Augustus) its greatest perfection. Among the great works now erected were temples, aqueducts, amphitheaters, magnificent villas, triumphal arches, monumental pillars, etc. The amphitheater differed from the theater it being a completely circular or rather elliptical building, filled on all sides with ascending seats for spectators and leaving only the central space, called the Arena, for the combatants and public shows. The Coliseum is a stupendous structure of this kind. The Thermæ, or baths, were vast structures in which multitudes of people could bathe at once. Magnificent tombs were often built by the wealthy. Remains of private residences are numerous, and the excavations at Pompeii in particular have thrown great light on the internal arrangements of the Roman dwelling-house. Almost all the successors of Augustus embellished Rome more or less, erected splendid palaces and temples, and adorned, like Hadrian, even the conquered countries with them. But after the period of Hadrian (117–138 A. D.) Roman architecture is considered to have been on the decline. The refined and noble style of the Greeks was neglected, and there was an attempt to embellish the beautiful more and more. This decline was all the more rapid latterly from the disturbed state of the empire and the incursions of the barbarians.

In Constantinople, after its virtual separation from the Western Empire, arose a style of art and architecture which was practiced by the Greek Church during the whole of the Middle Ages. This is called the Byzantine style. Then appeared the dome, the glory of the Byzantine school, the requirements which led to the abandonment in the ground plan of churches of the Latin cross in favor of the Grecian cross, whose branches are of equal length. The dogmas of the iconoclasts obliged the architects to seek some other means than sculpture of enriching their temples; hence the profusion of Mosaic work. Their ornaments represented foliage in bass-relief and interlaced lines. Under Belisarius and Narses the dome was introduced into Italy. The Byzantine style also became the basis of the new Persian, Russian, and Saracen schools. We find its peculiarities existing during the Middle Ages in Greece, Italy, Sicily, Spain, Arabia, and India. Among the chief edifices of this school are St. Sophia at Constantinople, St. Mark's at Venice, and San Vitale at Ravenna. The Saracens and Moors introduced into Europe certain forms of architecture founded on the remains of the Grecian school, blended with the Oriental elements of the Byzantine. Their chief peculiarity was in the form given to the arch. The Saracenic arch was of greater depth than width. The Moorish style was distinguished by arches in the shape of a horseshoe or a crescent. Their mural ornamentations, styled arabesque, presented more varied designs of graceful and ingenious combinations of geometrical and floral traceries than had before been known. The Lombards, who possessed themselves of North Italy after the middle of the Sixth Century, originated a complete and systematized style, which the people of each country where it was introduced modified to suit their climate, customs, and wants. Its branches are variously known as the Merovingian, Carlovingian, Saxon, Norman, etc., which together were styled old Gothic, and out of which grew the pointed style, after the introduction into Europe of the pointed arch. During the Middle Ages the study of the arts, sciences, and literature took refuge in the monasteries. The influence of the clergy declined, however, as free institutions arose, and the pointed Gothic must be regarded as the work rather of secular than of clerical architects. This change was doubtless made more complete by the increasing importance of the fraternity of Freemasons, who became in time sole directors or supervisors of all the religious structures. Protected by the Church, architecture in their hands passed from the old Gothic through various phases of the pointed style. This style is customarily divided into three periods: the first, or primary, dating from the end of the Twelfth Century; the second, or decorated, or rayonnant, from the commencement of the Fourteenth Century; and the third, or perpendicular, or flamboyant, from the end of the Fourteenth to the Sixteenth Century. The essential element of this style is the pointed arch. It is during the first period that the spire surmounting the tower becomes of so great importance. Butresses and flying buttresses also form a striking feature.

The windows gradually assume a less pointed form; the clustered columns composing the columnar piers are more elaborate; and the ribs, bosses, and carved ornaments throughout have more relief and are more elegant. The third period is remarkable for its profuse ornamentation. The panelled walls, with their niches, tabernacles, canopies, and screens, highly decorated, the flying buttresses enriched with pinnacles and tracery, the corbelled battlements and turrets, and the balustrades intricately carved and pierced, are characteristic of the epoch.

During the Fourteenth Century, or the trecento period, we discover in Italy, in the secular structures more especially, numerous examples exhibiting a return to the classic styles. At length, in the Sixteenth Century, the classic taste prevailed throughout Europe, and hence the different names, cinquecento, renaissance, revival, given to that style which supplanted everywhere the so-called Gothic architecture. Brunelleschi of Florence (died 1444) was among the first to encourage and disseminate this taste for a return to the classic architecture. He had numerous distinguished followers, among whom were Alberti, Bramante, Peruzzi, Sangallo, San Micheli, Palladio, and Scamozzi. In their productions the different elements of the classic style are happily introduced. The application of these elements to ecclesiastical, and more especially to secular, structures, accounts for the liberties taken with them, among which are the following: the great variety given to the intercolumniation of columns; the superposition of different orders, with and without broken entablatures; the frequent use of engaged columns and pilasters; the various forms given to the pediments; the substitution of columns for piers supporting arcades; the decoration of blank walls with medallions, foliage, and scrolls of various sorts, together with designs of animals arranged in imitation of ancient arabesques. These and many other so-called liberties originated a style peculiarly adapted to the wants of modern civilization. Michael Angelo made many innovations. Instead of superimposing several orders, distinguishing as many stories, he employed one, comprising the whole height of the edifice.

The spirit of scientific inquiry of the last hundred years, having enlarged our knowledge of architectural forms and promoted a more exhaustive study of the principles of the art, has given rise to two movements directed either to improving the so-called classical style, or to supplanting it altogether. These movements are known as the Greek and the Gothic revival. Both took their origin in England. The Greek revival dates from 1762, when Messrs. Stuart and Revett published the results of their researches among the antiquities of Attica. The Gothic revival may be said to date from Horace Walpole's works at Strawberry Hill about 100 years ago, but its modern development did not begin till about 1820. In England and the United States the Greek revival was merely a reproduction of the Greek buildings or parts of buildings; but in France it showed enough vigor to throw aside the methods of the ancients, and to create a new style, which has been called the néo-grecque, or, to distinguish it from the Romanesque, founded upon Roman methods, the romantique. The column of July in Paris, parts of the Palais de Justice, the Bibliothèque Ste. Geneviève, and the Palais des Beaux-Arts, by MM. Duc, Labrouste, and Duban, are the typical monuments of this style. Meanwhile, in England, the Greek movement having failed, the ascendancy of the Gothic style was finally established, when in 1840 it was decided to adopt it for the new houses of parliament. This great undertaking gave an immense impulse to the Gothic movement. Subsequent works show not only greater knowledge and skill, but more freedom of mind, both in secular and ecclesiastical work; and the "Victorian Gothic," as it has been called, differs as much from the various Gothic styles of the Middle Ages as they differ from each other. A similar movement has meanwhile been going on in France and Germany, but less successfully. In Germany the proper pointed Gothic has been taken up, stimulated by the great works for the completion of the Cologne cathedral. The Votive Church at Vienna is perhaps the most noteworthy example of this movement. The adherents of the Gothic revival in this country are as numerous and devoted as those of the Greek revival; but there is less partisanship here than abroad, and it is more common for architects to practice in both ways at once.

America can hardly claim to have produced a special school of architecture, but there are many public edifices that deserve to be mentioned as specimens of architectural beauty. Many of our best architects are now designing in what is termed the "colonial" style, which is an adaptation of the Dutch style so much in vogue in this country during the last two centuries. Comparatively little attention was paid to architecture before the Civil War, but the growing taste and prosperity of the country have enabled architects to erect many handsome dwelling-houses, which will in no way suffer by comparison with those of European cities. Brick, stone, and iron are now much used in this country, and the Gothic style has been widely adopted for church edifices. Trinity Church in New York, completed in 1846, one of the first great Gothic edifices of stone in the United States, Grace Church, and St. Patrick's Cathedral, in the same city, are fine specimens of that style. The Temple Emmanuel is a reproduction of Saracenic forms. The Roman Catholic Cathedral in Philadelphia is modeled after the Italian edifices of the time of Michael Angelo. Trinity Church, of Boston, is the best example of the Romanesque, influenced by the Byzantine, copied from edifices erected in France during the Twelfth Century. The new "Old South Church" in Boston, is a building of strong form and decoration. The museum of art in the same city inclines to the Venetian Gothic, and among the more prominent of the later renaissance buildings are the Boston and New York post-offices, built of granite, brick, and iron. The lofty "Tribune" building is a noticeable feature of the lower part of New York. The War, State, and Navy building, of Washington, D. C., The Grand Central railroad depot of New York, and the new Lowell and Providence depots in Boston, are splendid and well-appointed structures. The capitol at Washington, the corner stone of which was laid in 1793, is in the style of renaissance. Extensive additions have been made to both wings since 1850. The material used is a handsome marble, the original building being of sandstone. The treasury building and the patent office are in the Greek style, as are the sub-treasury and custom-house, at New York, Girard College, Philadelphia, and the Alabama State capitol. Of public buildings in Gothic form, a high rank must be given to the Connecticut State capitol at Hartford, the new capitol at Albany, N. Y., and the Ohio capitol at Columbus. In Florida and California many examples of the Spanish type are to be found. Many fine buildings have been erected for commercial purposes in various cities of the United States which justly deserve the title of "business palaces," and are well suited to accommodate our merchant princes. Although architects are somewhat fettered by the small lots of twenty-five feet in width, prevailing in most of our cities, many dwelling-houses present remarkably handsome exteriors and interiors. Fifth Avenue, in New York, is in this respect one of the finest thoroughfares in the world. The apartment houses, which have come into fashion since the late war, covering more than one lot, have fared better in an artistic point of view, of which the Stevens house of New York is one of the notable examples. Many beautiful country residences are to be found at Newport, Long Branch, and scattered throughout the country.

Arctic Exploration. Frobisher, Davis, Hudson, Bylot, and Baffin successively, were the first to engage in an effort to reach the North Pole. Then after a lapse of nearly two centuries the record of Arctic research was taken up by such men as Ross and Parry (1818), who were followed by Sir John Franklin. Franklin set sail in command of the "Erebus" and "Terror," in May, 1845, and by the month of July reached Whalefish Islands in Davis' Strait. On the 26th of that month the ships were seen in latitude 74° 48' north; longitude 66° 13' west; after which no further intelligence concerning them was received. It was not, however, till the beginning of 1847 that serious apprehensions were entertained regarding the expedition. The most strenuous efforts were then made by both the English and the Americans to obtain tidings of Franklin. Among the numerous expeditions sent out by sea and land in search of the missing navigator and his company were those of Richardson and Rae (by land, 1847), of Moore (1848-52), of Kellet (1848-50), of Shedden (1848-50), of Sir James Ross (1848-49), of Saunders (1849-50), of Austin and Ommaney (1850-51), and of Penny (1850-51). In 1850, MacClure set out by Behring's Strait on a search expedition, and to him is due the honor of having ascertained the existence of the long-sought-for northwest passage. Other expeditions between 1850 and 1855 were: Collinson's, Rae's, Kennedy's, Maguire's, Belcher's, MacClintock's, and Inglefield's. In 1853, Rae, proceeding to the east side of King William Sound, obtained the first tidings of the destruction of Franklin's ships. In 1855, Anderson, proceeding up the Great Fish River, also discovered relics of the "Erebus" and "Terror." At length MacClintock (1857-59) set all doubts at rest regarding the fate of Sir John Franklin and his companions, by establishing the fact that they had died in 1847. Dr. Kane made some important observations during the progress of his Arctic explorations, 1853-55. Then followed the expeditions of Dr. Isaac Hayes in 1860 and 1869, and those of Captain Charles Hall in 1860 and 1864. Finally, Lieutenant Schwatka headed an overland expedition in 1879-80 in search of the journals of the Franklin expedition. Of later expeditions may be mentioned that of the unfortunate and ill-advised

"Jeannette" (1879), sent out under the command of Lieutenant DeLong, to explore the Arctic Sea through Behring's Strait; those of Mr. Leigh Smith in 1880 and 1881, in the latter of which he lost his vessel; and that of Sir C. Young for the relief of the former. An expedition sent out by the United States under Greely (1881-84), reached 83° 24' north. In 1888, South Greenland was crossed by Nansen, and March 14, 1895, he attained 83° 59'. In 1892, Peary traced Greenland to 82° north.

In 1896, Dr. Fridtjof Nansen, of Norway, returned from an Arctic expedition, after an absence of more than three years. The most northerly point reached by him was 86° 14' north latitude, or 200 miles nearer the Pole than ever reached before. He found no indications of land north of 82° north latitude, and in the higher latitudes no open sea, only narrow cracks in the ice.

In 1906, Lieutenant Peary attained the farthest north in the western hemisphere, latitude 87° 6'. In 1902, he had pushed the advance on the American side beyond his own best record established in 1901, and sixty miles beyond the point reached by Lockwood and Brainerd of the Greely expedition in 1882, which had stood as the American record for nineteen years. He encountered the greatest dangers in his efforts to reach the Pole, and showed ability and endurance which place him high in the rank of explorers.

In September, 1909, Dr. Frederick A. Cook startled the world by his announcement of his discovery of the Pole on April 21, 1908, and five days later Peary announced that he too, a year after Cook, had reached the long sought goal.

The best records of Arctic exploration previous to the announcements of Cook and Peary are as follows:

YEAR	EXPLORERS	NORTH LATITUDE
1607.	Hudson,	80°	23'	0"
1773.	Phipps,	80°	48'	0"
1806.	Scoresby,	81°	12'	42"

Arctic Ocean, or Northern Icy Sea, is that part of the ocean which extends from the Arctic circle, latitude 66° 30' north, to the North Pole; it washes the whole of the northern coasts of Europe, Asia, and America, and communicates on the northwest of Europe with the Atlantic; and on the northeast of Asia with the Pacific by Behring Strait. It forms the White Sea in Europe, and the gulfs of Kara, Obi, and Yenesei, in Siberia; in North America, where it takes the name of the "Polar Sea," it forms Baffins' Bay. During winter ice extends in every direction round the Pole, covering a space of from 3,000 to 4,000 miles in diameter; and even during the four months of summer the surface of this sea is at the freezing-point. Icebergs and fields of ice are continually drifting south into the Atlantic,—the former sometimes extending to 100 miles in length, and from twenty-five to thirty miles in diameter.

Argentine Republic, formerly called the United Provinces of La Plata, is a vast country of South America; extreme length, 2,300 miles; average breadth a little over 500 miles. It is bounded on the north by Bolivia; on the east by Paraguay, Brazil, Uruguay, and the Atlantic; on the south by the Antarctic Ocean; and on the west by the Andes. With the exception of the northwest, where lateral branches of the Andes run into the plain for 150 or 200 miles, and the province of Entre Rios, which is hilly, the characteristic feature of the country is the great monotonous and level plains called pampas. In the north, these plains are partly forest-covered, but all the central and south parts present vast treeless tracts, which afford pasture to immense herds of horses, oxen, and sheep, and are varied in some places by brackish swamps, in others by salt steppes. European grains and fruits, including the vine, have been successfully introduced, and are cultivated in most parts of the republic; countless herds of cattle and horses and flocks of sheep are pastured on the pampas, and multiply there very rapidly. Gold, silver, nickel, copper, tin, lead, and iron, besides marble, jasper, precious stones, and bitumen, are found in the mountainous districts of the northwest, while petroleum wells have been discovered on the Rio Vermejo; but the development of this mineral wealth has hitherto been greatly retarded by the want of proper means of transport. As a whole, there are not extensive forests in the country, except in the region of the Gran Chaco (which extends also into Bolivia), where there is known to be 60,000 square miles of timber. Thousands of square miles are covered with thistles, which grow to a great height in their season. Cacti also form great thickets. Peach and apple trees are abundant in some districts. The native fauna includes the puma, the jaguar, the tapir, the llama, the alpaca, the vicuna, armadillos, the rhea or nandu, a species of ostrich, etc. The climate is agreeable and healthful, 97° being about the highest temperature experienced. As a whole, this vast country is very thinly inhabited, some parts of it as yet being very little known. The native Indians were never very numerous, and have given little trouble to the European settlers. Tribes of them yet in the savage state still inhabit the less-known districts, and live by hunting and fishing. Some of the Gran Chaco tribes are said to be very fierce, and European travelers have been killed by them. The European element is strong in the republic, more than half of the population being Europeans or of pure European descent. Large numbers of immigrants arrive from Southern Europe, the Italians having the preponderance among those of foreign birth. The typical inhabitants of the pampas are the Gauchos, a race of half-breed cattle-rearers and horse-breakers; they are almost continually on horseback, galloping over the plains, collecting their herds and droves, taming wild horses, or catching and slaughtering cattle. In such occupations they acquire a marvelous dexterity in the use of the lasso and bolas.

Armenia, a country of Western Asia, extending from the Caucasus on the north to the mountains of Kurdistan on the south, and from the Euphrates on the west, to near the Caspian on the east. It is subdivided among the Turkish pashalics of Erzeroum, Kars, and Van, and parts of the Persian province of Azerbijan, and the Russian Government of Transcaucasia. The native Armenians, estimated at one-seventh of the whole population, are distinguished for their enterprise in commercial and banking transactions. The Armenian Christians mostly belong to an ecclesiastical establishment of their own, similar in many respects to the Greek Church; but many have adhered to the Roman Catholic faith. Chief towns, Kars and Erzeroum. Christian population about 1,000,000, with an equal number of Kurds, Turks, Tartars, etc. In 1878, after the Russo-Turkish War, Russia acquired the districts of Kars and Ardahan. The Armenians suffered severely in life and property from the invasion of Kurds in 1882, and in 1895, such frightful massacres took place that the great powers of Europe were moved to demand thorough measures of reform from the Sultan in the government of Armenia. The Sultan temporized and delayed until the powers sent armed ships to Constantinople.

Arles (arl), a city of France, in the department of Bouches du Rhône, about forty-six miles northwest of Marseilles. Arles was the Arelate of the Romans. It was an important town at the time of Cæsar's invasion, about 59 B. C., and afterwards received a Roman colony, of which there are many remains, including a magnificent amphitheater, and a palace built by the Emperor Constantine, about A. D. 306. Arles was the seat of the Merovingian kings in the Sixth Century. It now carries on a considerable trade, and has manufactures in silk, etc., besides furnishing a market for the products of the surrounding country. The population of the city, in 1901, was 28,573.

Athens, the capital of Greece, situated on a peninsula formed by the rivers Ilissus and Cephesis, about four miles from the eastern shore of the Gulf of Egina. It is built at the base of the hill on which stands the Acropolis, and has been greatly improved architecturally of late years, since the new kingdom of Greece was established. The royal palace, completed in 1843, is one of its most imposing modern structures; the city is the seat of a bishopric of the Greek Church; and it has a university, attended usually by upwards of 1,000 students. Athens is, however, chiefly interesting on account of its history, and through its possession of those monuments of antiquity which still attest its former greatness. All these are on or close around the Acropolis. Chief of these are the remains of Pelasgic walls and dwellings; the Propylæa, or Gate; the Pinacotheka; Temple of Wingless Victory, and, above all, the Parthenon, built by Pericles, much destroyed by an explosion in the Seventeenth Century. Athens is said to have been founded about 1550 B. C. In the time of Pericles (460–429 B. C.), it contained 10,000 houses, with a population estimated at from 120,000 to 180,000; and even after its occupation by the Romans it continued to be a great and flourishing city, and one of the chief seats of learning, till it was ravaged by the Goths, in the Fourth Century, falling ultimately, after many changes, into the hands of the Turks, under whose influence it remained from A. D. 1456 to 1832. Of the ancient city, the principal remains are the Parthenon, or Temple of Athena, and a Temple of Theseus, both built also in the Fifth Century before Christ. There are also the remains of a grand temple to Zeus (Jupiter), to the southeast of the Acropolis, and a short distance to the west is the Areopagus. As the capital of the modern kingdom of Greece, the trade of Athens has considerably revived, and a railway now connects the city with the port of the Piræus, or Porto Leone. Population, 128,735.

Athos, a mountain on the coast of Macedonia, at the extremity of the long peninsula which projects into the Ægean Sea, between the Gulfs of Contessa and Monte Santo. The mountain is now known as "Monte Santo," or Holy Mountain, from the large number of monasteries, convents, chapels, and other sacred spots, belonging to the Greek Church, that are scattered over its sides. These foundations are traced to the reign of the Emperor Constantine. The name "Athos" was, however, properly applied to the whole mountainous peninsula, which is joined to the mainland by a low flat isthmus, not more than a mile and a half across, and only about fifteen feet above the sea level. When Xerxes invaded Greece (480 B. C.) he cut a channel across this isthmus, traces of which are still visible.

Atlantic Ocean, one of the five great hydrographical divisions of the globe, occupies an immense longitudinal valley, and extends from the Arctic Circle on the north to the Antarctic Circle on the south; bounded west by the coast of America to Cape Horn, and thence by a line continued on the same meridian to the Antarctic Circle; and east by the shores of Europe and Africa to the Cape of Good Hope, and thence prolonged on the meridian of Cape Agulhas till it meets the Antarctic Circle. Its extreme breadth is about 5,000 miles, and its area 25,000,000 square miles. The North Sea, or German Ocean, the Caribbean Sea, and the Irish Sea, form portions of the Atlantic; but the Baltic and Mediterranean, which communicate with it by narrow channels, are properly considered separate seas. The chief islands are, in Europe, the British Isles and Iceland; in Africa, the Azores, Madeira, and Canary Islands, and the archipelago of the Gulf of Guinea; in America, the Antilles, Newfoundland, and the islands of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The chief affluents are, in Europe, the Rhine, Loire, and Tagus; in Africa, the Senegal, Niger, and Congo; and in America, the St. Lawrence, Mississippi, Orinoco, Amazons, and La Plata. The bed of the Atlantic Ocean is very unequal in elevation, in some places rising in immense sand-banks to within a few fathoms of the surface, and in others sinking to unfathomable depths. The trade-winds blow regularly in the intertropical portion of the Atlantic; beyond these limits the winds are variable. From the prevalence of southwest winds in the North Atlantic, the voyage from America to Europe, on an average of six years' sailing between New York and Liverpool, is performed in twenty-three days, while the return voyage requires forty days. Enormous numbers of fish are found in the Atlantic Ocean, and herring and cod fishing are important branches of industry in Northern Europe and America. In the higher latitudes of the North and South Atlantic, navigation is impeded by immense icebergs, which are floated from the polar regions; and although these are generally melted before reaching the frequented parts of the ocean, they have occasionally been met with as far south as latitude 40° 45' in the North Atlantic, and in the vicinity of the Cape of Good Hope in the South Atlantic Ocean.

Australasia, a division of the globe usually regarded as comprehending the islands of Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, New Caledonia, the New Hebrides, the Solomon Islands, New Ireland, New Britain, the Admiralty Islands, New Guinea, and the Arru Islands, besides numerous other islands and island groups; area, 3,259,199 square miles, population about five millions. It forms one of three portions into which some geographers have divided Oceania, the other two being Malaysia and Polynesia.

Australia (older name, New Holland), the largest island in the world, a sea-girt continent, lying between the Indian and Pacific oceans, southeast of Asia; greatest length, from west to east, 2,400 miles; greatest breadth from north to south, 1,700 to 1,900 miles. It is separated from New Guinea on the north by Torres Strait, from Tasmania on the south by Bass Strait. It is divided into two unequal parts by the Tropic of Capricorn, and is occupied by what are known as the original states of the Commonwealth of Australia.

The area and the population (exclusive of aborigines) of the different states composing the Commonwealth of Australia in 1905 were as follows:

Original States	Area Sq. Mi.	Pop.
New South Wales,	310,367	1,496,050
Victoria,	87,884	1,218,571
Queensland,	668,497	528,048
South Australia,	903,690	374,398
Western Australia,	975,920	254,705
Tasmania,	26,215	181,106
Total,	2,972,573	4,052,878

Sydney, the capital of New South Wales, Melbourne, the capital of Victoria, Adelaide, the capital of South Australia, and Brisbane, the capital of Queensland, are the chief towns. Australia is a region containing a vast quantity of mineral wealth. Foremost come its rich and extensive deposits of gold, which, since the precious metal was first discovered, in 1851, have produced a total of more than $1,350,000,000. The greatest quantity has been obtained in Victoria, but New South Wales and Queensland have also yielded a considerable amount. Probably there are rich stores of gold as yet undiscovered. Australia also possesses silver, copper, tin, lead, zinc, antimony, mercury, plumbago, etc., in abundance, besides coal (now worked to a considerable extent in New South Wales) and iron. Various precious stones are found, as the garnet, ruby, topaz, sapphire, and even the diamond. Of building stone there are granite, limestone, marble, and sandstone. The Australian flora presents peculiarities which mark it off by itself in a very decided manner. Many of its most striking features have an unmistakable relation to the general dryness of the climate. The trees and bushes have, for the most part, a scanty foliage, presenting little surface for evaporation, or thick leathery leaves well fitted to retain moisture. The Australian fauna is almost unique in its character. Its great feature is the nearly total absence of all the forms of mammalia which abound in the rest of the world.

Austria, or Austria-Hungary, is an extensive monarchy in Central Europe, inhabited by several distinct nationalities, and consisting of two semi-independent countries, each with its own parliament and government, but with one common sovereign, army, and system of diplomacy, and also with a parliament common to both. Its greatest length from east to west is about 860 miles; its greatest breadth from north to south, with the exclusion of Dalmatia and part of Croatia, is about 400 miles; bounded south by Turkey, the Adriatic Sea, and the kingdom of Italy; west by Switzerland, Bavaria, and Saxony; north by Prussia and Russian Poland; and east by Russia and Roumania. On the shores of the Adriatic, along the coasts of Dalmatia, Croatia, Istria, etc., lies its only sea frontage.

None of the European states, with the exception of Russia, exhibits such a diversity of race and language among their population as does the Austrian Empire. The Slavs, who amount to above 19,000,000 or 45 per cent. of the total population, are the chief of the component nationalities of the monarchy in point of numbers, forming the great mass of the population of Bohemia, Moravia, Carniola, Galicia, Dalmatia, the kingdom of Croatia and Slavonia, and Northern Hungary, and half the population of Silesia and Bukowina. This preponderance, however, is only apparent, as none of the other races are split up into so many branches, differing so greatly from each other in language, religion, civilization, manners, and customs. These branches are the North Slavic Czechs, Moravians, and Slovaks, the Ruthenians and Poles, and the South Slavic Slovenians, Croats, Serbs, and Bulgarians. The Germans, about 10,570,000 in number, are scattered over the whole monarchy, and form almost the sole population of the archduchy of Austria, Salzburg, the greatest portion of Styria and Carinthia, almost the whole of Tyrol and Vorarlberg, considerable portions of Bohemia and Moravia, the whole of the west of Silesia, etc.; and they are also numerous in Hungary and Transylvania. The Magyars or Hungarians (7,440,000 in number, or about 16 per cent. of the total population) form the great bulk of the inhabitants of the kingdom of Hungary and of the east portion of Transylvania. To the Italic or Western Ro-manic stock belong the inhabitants of South Tyrol and parts of the coast lands and Dalmatia, numbering about 700,000 in all. A considerable portion of the southeast of the empire is occupied by members of the Roumanian (or Eastern Romanic) stock, who number altogether about 2,800,000, and form more than half the population of Transylvania, besides being spread over the southeast parts of Hungary, Bukowina, and part of Croatia and Slavonia. The number of Jews is also very considerable (above 1,000,000), especially in Galicia, Hungary, Bohemia, and Moravia. There are also several other races whose numbers are small, such as the Gypsies (95,000), who are most numerous in Hungary and Transylvania, and the Albanians in Dalmatia and neighboring regions. The population is thickest in Lower Austria, Bohemia, Silesia, and Moravia; thinnest in Salzburg. Generally speaking, it decreases in density from west to east. The principal cities are: Vienna, the capital; Budapest, Prague, Trieste, Reichenburg, and Fiume.

Baltic Sea is the great gulf or shut sea bordered by Denmark, Germany, Russia, and Sweden, communicating with the Kattegat and North Sea by the Sound and Great and Little Belts. Its length is from 850 to 900 miles, width from 100 to 200, and area, including Gulfs of Bothnia and Finland, 160,000 square miles. Its depth is, on an average, fifteen to twenty fathoms, in many places not half so much, seldom more than forty or fifty, and never exceeding 167.

Baltimore, one of the largest and most flourishing cities of the United States, on the Patapsco Bay, in Maryland thirty-seven miles northeast of Washington, and 100 miles southwest of Philadelphia. It was founded in 1729, and has been named the "monumental city," from the fine public monuments which adorn it. Among its many public buildings is the Peabody Institute, endowed by the late George Peabody, containing a library, art-gallery, etc., with a dome 115 feet high. It has also a city hall, built of white Maryland marble, with a dome 227 feet high. The manufactures and commerce of Baltimore are very various. In its vicinity is found the finest brick-clay in the world, of which more than 100,000,000 bricks are made annually. It has some of the largest ironworks in the United States. Oysters, taken in the Chesapeake Bay, are largely exported. The city is also one of the largest flour-markets in the United States, and tobacco is a principal export. The harbor is very extensive. From east to west the city is nearly five miles long, and four miles broad from north to south. It was visited by a destructive fire in 1904, entailing a loss of $90,000,000. Population, 546,217.

Bangkok, the capital city of Siam, situated on both banks of the Menam, about twenty miles from its mouth. The population is about 600,000, nearly half of whom are Chinese, the others including Burmese, Annamese, Cambodians, Malays, Eurasians, and Europeans. The foreign trade of Siam centers in Bangkok, and is mainly in the hands of the Europeans and Chinese. The approach to Bangkok by the Menam, which can be navigated by ships of 350 tons burden (large sea-going ships anchor at Paknam, below the bar at the mouth of the river), is exceedingly beautiful. The internal traffic of Bangkok is chiefly carried on by means of canals, there being only a few passable streets in the whole city. Horses and carriages are rarely seen, except in the neighborhood of the palaces. The native houses on land — of bamboo or other wood, like the floating houses — are raised upon piles, six or eight feet from the ground, and are reached by ladders. The circumference of the walls of Bangkok, which are fifteen to thirty feet high, and twelve broad, is about six miles.

Barcelona is the most important manufacturing city in Spain. The streets of the old town, forming the northwest division, are crooked, narrow, and ill-paved. Those of the new are much more spacious and regular. There is a large suburb east of the town where the seafaring portion of the population chiefly reside. It possesses the finest theater in Spain, and numerous ancient and elegant churches, with a cathedral which was begun in 1298. Barcelona manufactures silk, woolens, cottons, lace, hats, fire-arms, etc., which form its principal exports. It imports raw cotton, coffee, cocoa, sugar, and other colonial produce; also Baltic timber, salt-fish, hides, iron, wax, etc. Next to Cadiz, it is the most important port in Spain. Population, 533,090.

Bastille, formerly a general name for a fortress, or prison, in France; but applied more particularly to an old castle, originally the castle of Paris, which was built between A. D. 1369 and 1383, and was used as a state prison in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries. It was demolished by the enraged populace at the breaking-out of the French Revolution, July 15, 1789.

Belfast, a city and seaport of Ireland, principal town of Ulster, and county town of Antrim, is built on low, alluvial land on the left bank of the Lagan, at the head of Belfast Lough. Previous to about 1830 the cotton manufacture was the leading industry of Belfast, but nearly all the mills have been converted to flax spinning. The iron ship-building trade is also of importance, and there are breweries, distilleries, flour mills, oil mills, foundries, print works, tan yards, chemical works, rope works, etc. The commerce is large. An extensive direct trade is carried on with British North America, the Mediterranean, France, Belgium, Holland, and the Baltic, besides ports of the British Islands. Belfast is comparatively a modern town. Population, 349,180.

Belgium, a kingdom of Europe, bounded north by Holland, northwest by the North Sea, west and south by France, and east by the duchy of Luxemburg, Rhenish Prussia, and Dutch Limburg; greatest length, 165 miles; greatest breadth, 120 miles. For administrative purposes it is divided into nine provinces — Antwerp, South Brabant, East Flanders, West Flanders, Hainaut, Liege, Limburg, Luxemburg, and Namur. The greater part of the country is well adapted for agricultural operations, and the inhabitants have so happily availed themselves of their natural advantages that they early began, and in some respects still deserve, to be regarded as the model farmers of Europe. The mineral riches of Belgium are great, and, after agriculture, form the most important of her national interests. They are almost entirely confined to the four provinces of Hainaut, Liege, Namur, and Luxemburg, and consist of lead, manganese, calamine or zinc, iron, and coal. All these minerals, however, are insignificant compared with those of iron and coal. The coal field has an area of above 500 square miles. The export is about 5,000,000 tons, forming one of the largest and most valuable of all the Belgium exports. Nearly the whole of the coal thus exported is taken by France. The industrial products of Belgium are very numerous, and the superiority of many of them to those of most other countries is confessed. The fine linens of Flanders, and lace of South Brabant are of European reputation. Scarcely less celebrated are the carpets and porcelain of Tournay, the cloth of Verviers, the extensive foundries, machine works, and other iron and steel establishments of Liege, Seraing, and other places. The cotton and woolen manufactures, confined chiefly to Flanders and the province of Antwerp, have advanced greatly. Other manufactures include silks, beet sugar, beer. Principal cities: Brussels, Antwerp, Liege, Ghent, and Bruges.

Bering Strait, the channel which separates Asia and America at their nearest approach to each other, and connects the Arctic with the Pacific Ocean (Bering Sea). It is thirty-six miles across. Shores rocky, bare, and greatly indented. It was traversed in 1728, by Vitus Bering, a Russian navigator, who perished during a second expedition, 1741, on Bering's Island, for whom it was named.

Berlin, the capital of Prussia, and seat of the imperial government of Germany, one of the finest and most important cities of Europe, is situated on the Spree. Notwithstanding the natural disadvantages of its situation, the advance of the city, especially in late years, has been extraordinary. The center of the city is now devoted almost exclusively to commerce, and round this part, extending considerably beyond the city boundaries, are congregated the residences of the citizens. Berlin possesses a large number of very fine buildings. Of these may be mentioned the royal palace, the emperor's palace, and that of the crown prince; the royal library, which contains about 1,200,000 volumes and 15,000 MSS.; the museums, the arsenal, and the guard-house. The Berlin Museum of Fine Arts is rapidly becoming one of great importance. Its collection of casts from the antique and the renaissance is not surpassed by any in Europe. The city is adorned throughout with numerous statues of military heroes, the equestrian statue of Frederick the Great, by Rauch, being the most remarkable. The university established in 1810 possesses a very high reputation. Population, 2,040,148.

Birmingham, the chief town in Britain for metallic manufactures, and supplying much of the world with hardwares, stands near the center of England, in the northwest of Warwickshire. It is one of the best drained towns in England, while the means which have been adopted for the prevention of smoke-contamination of the atmosphere are so far effectual that the air is unusually clear and salubrious. The older part of Birmingham is crowded with workshops and warehouses; but the modern is well built and possesses some architectural beauty. Its commercial importance dates from the Seventeenth Century, when the restoration of Charles II. brought from France a rage for metal ornaments, which Birmingham supplied. Population, 776,000.

Bombay City occupies the entire breadth of the southern end of the island of Bombay, bordering at once on the harbor inside and on Back Bay outside. Parsees or Persians, descendants of fire-worshippers, driven from their homes by Mohammedan bigotry, rank next to the English in respectability and influence. Besides the dock-yard, which covers about 200 acres, at the southeast of the European town, the objects most worthy of note are the town-hall, the library of the Asiatic Society, the mint, cathedral, and custom-house; the post-office and public works office; the missionary houses, the Elphinstone Institution, the Grant Medical College, the university, and Sassoon's High School; the Jamsetjee Hospital, and the Jamsetjee Obstetric Hospital.

Boston, capital of the State of Massachusetts; the commercial metropolis of New England; and the fifth city in population in the United States, according to the federal census of 1900, is built at the west end of Massachusetts Bay, and comprises Boston proper, East Boston, South Boston, Roxbury, Dorchester, Charlestown, Brighton, West Roxbury, and adjoining territory, giving it in 1900, an area of about forty square miles. Old Boston, or Boston proper, occupied a peninsula of about 700 acres, of uneven surface, and originally containing three hills, known as Beacon, Copp, and Fort. These hills caused the early settlers to call the place Trimountain, since changed to Tremont. Boston, East Boston, Charlestown, and South Boston contain the slips of the ocean steamers. Extending about two miles along the harbor, and separated from Boston proper by an arm of it, is South Boston, containing large railroad docks and warehouses. Several bridges across Charles River connect the city with Charlestown and Cambridge. The harbor is an indentation of Massachusetts Bay, embracing about seventy-five square miles, with numerous arms, and containing many islands presenting picturesque views. Boston is especially noted for its magnificent park system. Among the attractions of the system are the Common, a park of eighty-four acres in the heart of the city; the Public Garden, separated from it by Charles Street, and comprising twenty-two acres; the Back Bay Fens; the Jamaica Pond, Bussey Park, the Arnold Arboretum; Marine Park at City Point; and the Charles River Embankment. In the Common is a Soldiers' and Sailors' Monument, erected near the site of the famous Old Elm, which was destroyed in a gale in 1876. In the Public Garden are an equestrian statue of Washington, a bronze statue of Edward Everett, a statue of Charles Sumner, one representing "Venus Rising from the Sea," and a monument commemorating the discovery of ether as an anæsthetic. The State House stands on Beacon Hill, and is a structure 490 feet long and 211 feet wide, with a colonnade in front and an imposing gilded dome. Statues of Daniel Webster and Horace Mann ornament the terrace in front of the building, and within it are statues and busts of a number of the eminent men of Boston and Massachusetts, a collection of battle flags, and a variety of interesting historical articles. The new building of the Public Library, which was occupied in 1895, is, next to the Library of Congress, the largest one in the country. The Old State-house, erected in 1748, at the head of State Street, contains an historical museum in its upper floors, and business establishments in its lower. The City Hall, one of the most striking buildings of the city, on School Street, is built of white Concord granite in the Italian Renaissance style, and is surmounted by a dome over 100 feet high. What is considered the most interesting building, historically, in the United States, next to Independence Hall in Philadelphia, is Faneuil Hall, known as "The Cradle of Liberty," erected in 1742, destroyed by fire in 1761, rebuilt in 1768, and remodeled to its present size in 1805. The basement of the building is now used as a market, and the second floor for large public gatherings. Occupying the site of the Old Redoubt on Breed's Hill, in the Charlestown district, is the famous Bunker Hill monument. In the Charlestown district also is located the United States Navy Yard, which, among other objects of interest, contains the largest rope walk in the country, and an immense dry dock. Boston is widely noted for the number and high character of its educational institutions. The institutions for higher education include Boston College, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Boston Normal School, Massachusetts Normal Art School, Kindergarten Training School, and Training Schools for Nurses. Among the chief hospitals are: City Hospital, Children's Hospital, Massachusetts General Hospital, Massachusetts Homœopathic Hospital, New England Baptist Hospital, New England Deaconess's Home and Hospital, New England Hospital for Women and Children, St. Elizabeth's Hospital, Somerville Hospital, and Women's Charity Club Hospital. Boston was settled in 1630 by a party of Puritans from Salem. It was named after a town in Lincolnshire, England, from which most of the colonists had come. In 1632 the first meeting house was erected, and in 1635, a public school was built. In the same year, the first grand jury in the country met here. A memorable massacre occurred here in 1770, and in 1773, several cargoes of English tea were thrown overboard in the harbor, by citizens exasperated by the imposition of taxes. During the early part of the Revolution the British were quartered in the town. The battle of Bunker Hill was fought on Breed's Hill, within the present city limits, June 17, 1775. Washington forced the British to evacuate in 1776. The city charter was granted in 1822, and, in 1872, a great fire broke out in the business portion of the city and destroyed about sixty-five acres of buildings. This part of the city was soon rebuilt, and, since then, Boston has been one of the most prosperous cities in the United States. Population, 595,380.

Brazil (brä-zīl' or brä-zēl'), republic of South America, lying to the northeast of that continent, and bounded north and east by the Atlantic Ocean. It constitutes nearly one-half of South America, and occupies an area nearly equal to the whole of Europe. It is remarkable for its rivers and its forests, the former being unsurpassed both in number and in size in any other part of the globe, and the latter being of vast extent, some of them covering many thousands of miles of surface. Towards the coast-line, and near the banks of the rivers, the land is low, but in the interior it rises, by gentle gradations, to the height of from two to three thousand feet above the level of the sea, and is crossed by hill ranges, which rise to a considerably greater elevation. In these regions, European fruits and grains are produced in large quantities, while the intermediate valleys are found extremely favorable for the raising of sugar, coffee, cotton, cocoa, india rubber, and tropical plants. The forests abound in the greatest variety of useful and beautiful woods, as mahogany, logwood, rosewood, and brazil wood. Minerals are exceedingly abundant, comprising gold, silver, iron, and topazes, and most of the diamonds of commerce come from Brazil. These, with hides, agricultural produce, and the other products above mentioned, are the chief exports. The population of Brazil is about 18,000,000, of whom about 2,000,000 are negroes, 1,250,000 native Indians, and the remainder descendants of the Portuguese, or of mixed races. Slavery formerly prevailed largely in Brazil, but in 1871, a law was passed for its gradual abolition. Its greatest river is the Amazon, and the chief cities are Rio de Janeiro, Bahia, and Pernambuco.

British Museum, the great national museum in London, owes its foundation to Sir Hans Sloane, who, in 1753, bequeathed his various collections, including 50,000 books and manuscripts, to the nation, on the condition of $100,000 being paid to his heirs. This offer was agreed to by parliament. The British Museum is under the management of forty-eight trustees, among the chief being the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord-chancellor, and the speaker of the House of Commons. In all, the staff of the institution numbers over 320 persons. The museum is open daily, free of charge. Admission to the reading-room as a regular reader is by ticket, procurable on application to the chief librarian, there being certain simple conditions attached. The institution contains something like 2,000,000 volumes in the department of printed books. A copy of every book, pamphlet, newspaper, piece of music, etc., published anywhere in British territory, must be conveyed, free of charge, to the British Museum.

Brussels, the capital of the kingdom of Belgium, and of the province of South Brabant in that kingdom. It is a large and important city, often described as a miniature Paris. It is built partly on the slope of a hill, and partly on the plain at the foot. The upper town, on the hillside, is the newer and the more fashionable, and there the royal palace and the mansions of the foreign ministers are situated. The lower town is less healthful, but it contains most of the older buildings, and many churches and public edifices of architectural and historical interest. The town has extensive suburbs, and squares and promenades of great beauty and elegance. Its Church of St. Gudule dates from the Twelfth Century; and the Palace of Fine Arts, which was formerly the residence of the governors of Brabant, includes a picture gallery which contains many fine specimens of the Flemish school of painting, and a library with 240,000 volumes, and upwards of 20,000 manuscripts. There is also an observatory, one of the finest in Europe, and the imposing Palace of Justice. In the great market-place is the Hotel de Ville, a splendid Gothic edifice of the Fourteenth Century, with a lofty turret, surmounted by a huge figure of St. Michael, in copper. Brussels is remarkable for its statues and fountains. Its most important manufactures are lace and carpets. Ten miles to the south of the city is the Field of Waterloo, and a few miles beyond lie Quatre Bras and Ligny. Population, 612,401.

Buda-Pesth (bū'da-pěst), a city of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, the capital of Hungary since 1873. It is situated on both sides of the River Danube, 130 miles southeast of Vienna. Buda, on the west side of the Danube, is built at the extremity of a spur from the Bakony forest range. It is an old-fashioned place, and carries on a considerable trade, chiefly in wines. A fine suspension bridge connects it with Pesth, one of the handsomest cities in Austria. Pesth is the seat of a university, and has manufactures of silk, woolen, leather, tobacco, and meerschaum pipes. Four great fairs are held in the city annually. The Diet assembles in a handsome building, and new boulevards and squares have been recently formed. During the Hungarian wars of the Nineteenth Century, Buda played a distinguished part. In January, 1849, the fortress was seized by the Austrian General Windischgrätz; but in the following May it was taken by storm by the Hungarians under Görgey. On their departure, the Russians took possession, but shortly afterwards handed the place over to the forces of the Austrians. Population, 732,322.

Buenos Ayres, the capital of Argentine Republic, South America, stands on the west bank of the estuary of the Plata, about 150 miles from the open sea. It is compactly and substantially built, having been greatly improved since its independence. It has a large number of public and private buildings that would honor any city, notably the cathedral, the provincial bank, the post-office, the national penitentiary, several of the theaters, etc. Four lines of railroads connect it with the interior. Telegraphic cables extend to Montevideo, the Brazilian ports, and Europe, and overland wires cross the Andes to Chile, and so connect with the northern hemisphere by the Pacific coast lines. Buenos Ayres has a university, a national college, a normal school for ladies, with numerous other literary and scientific institutions, a museum of natural history, a public library, and a score of newspapers. Population, 1,000,-250.

Buffalo, a city of New York, capital of Erie County, is at the east end of Lake Erie, and at the head of Niagara River, and 410 miles by shortest railroad line northwest of New York. It has a capacious harbor, protected by an outer breakwater, besides other breakwaters, piers, basins, and canals. The city is guarded by Fort Porter, which stands on a bluff overlooking the river. The International iron railway bridge spans Niagara River at Black Rock. The commercial importance of Buffalo dates from the completion of the Erie Canal, in 1825. The chief marine business is the receiving, storing, and transferring of grain. The livestock trade is enormous, and the lumber trade (including the suburb of Tonawanda) is the largest in the world. Manufactories are numerous, embracing extensive machine-shops, automobile shops, car shops, stove foundries, breweries, flour mills, printing and lithographic establishments, etc. Sixteen railroads enter the city, with over 660 miles of trackage in the city limits—more than in any other city in the world. Buffalo has wide streets, well paved and lighted, and generally lined with shade trees. Natural gas, piped from Pennsylvania and Canada, is much used. It has excellent sewerage, and extensive water-works, the supply coming from Niagara River. Its healthfulness is attested by a low death-rate. A magnificent park system consists of three sections connected by boulevards which encircle the city. There are churches of all denominations, numerous public schools, the high-schools, and a State Normal School; various hospitals, dispensaries, orphan asylums, and the State Hospital for the Insane. Buffalo was founded in 1801, by the Holland Land Company. It was burned in 1813, by the British and the Indians. It was incorporated as a city in 1832. Population (1905), 376,914.

Cairo, the modern capital of Egypt, and the largest town in Africa, situated on the eastern bank of the Nile, twelve miles above the apex of the Delta. On the opposite bank of the river is the small town of Ghizeh, in the neighborhood of which are the three largest of the Egyptian pyramids. To the south of the city is the site of the ancient city of Memphis. It is the official residence of the Khedive. Its inhabitants are Turks, Arabs, Copts, Jews, Armenians, Syrians, etc., the ruling class being almost all Turks. Population, 570,062.

Calcutta, the capital and metropolis of British India, was founded by Governor Charnock in the year 1686. In 1707, it had acquired some importance as a town, and was made the seat of a presidency. In 1756, however, a great misfortune befell the rising town; it was unexpectedly attacked by Surajah Dowlah, the Nawab of Bengal, and, being abandoned by a number of those whose duty it was to defend the place, it was compelled to yield after undergoing a two days' siege. Only 146 men, however, fell into the enemy's hands; but these were treated with the most heartless cruelty.

Cast at night into a confined cell, twenty feet square—the notorious “Black Hole”—they endured the most unheard-of sufferings, and in the morning it was found that only twenty-three out of 146 had survived the horrors of that night. The city remained in the hands of the enemy until eight months afterward, when Clive arrived from England. In conjunction with Admiral Watson, Clive succeeded in recapturing Calcutta, and afterward concluded a peace with the nawab. During the last century the city has grown greatly in importance, and in its public institutions and architecture it now rivals the leading capitals of Europe. Calcutta is the headquarters of the governor-general of India, and the seat of the government, the supreme courts of justice, and of the court of appeal for the province of Bengal. Population, 1,321,664.

Campanile (kām-pä-nē'lē), a tower for the reception of bells, principally used for church purposes, but now sometimes for domestic edifices. The most remarkable of the campaniles is that at Pisa, commonly called the “Leaning Tower.” It is cylindrical in form, and surrounded by eight stories of columns, placed over one another, each having its entablature. The height is about 150 feet to the platform, whence a plumb-line lowered falls on the leaning side nearly thirteen feet outside the base of the building.

The campanile of St. Mark, dominating all the surrounding buildings of St. Mark's Square, Venice, was the most conspicuous landmark of the city for over 1,000 years. The tower was 325 feet high and forty-two feet square at the base. On the morning of July 14, 1902, it fell with a great crash into the square. The church of St. Mark and the palace of the Doges were not hurt, but the campanile in falling carried away the Sansovino Loggetta and the library of the Royal Palace.

Canada, Dominion of. The Dominion of Canada includes the various Provinces of North America formerly known as Upper and Lower Canada (now Ontario and Quebec respectively), New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, British Columbia, and the territories of the Hudson Bay Company, now styled Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, the Northwest Territories, and the Yukon Territories; in fact, the whole of British North America except Newfoundland and Labrador. This territory, nearly as large as Europe, stretches from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, and is estimated to contain a total area of 3,745,574 square miles, and a population of 6,504,000. From a physical point of view the whole region may be divided into an eastern and a western division, the Red River Valley forming the separating line. The eastern division comprises three areas, presenting radically distinct aspects:—(1) The south-eastern area, bounded by the line of the Gulf and River St. Lawrence, from Belle Isle to Quebec, thence by a line running directly south to Lake Champlain, which is generally hilly, and sometimes mountainous, with many fine stretches of agricultural and pastoral lands. (2) The southern and western area, presenting, in the main, a broad, level, and slightly undulating expanse of generally fertile country, with occasional step-like ridges or rocky escarpments. The main hydrographical feature is the chain of lakes, with an area of 150,000 square miles, contributing to the great river system of the St. Lawrence. (3) The northern area, embracing nearly two-thirds of the Dominion, with an average elevation of 1,000 feet above the level of the sea, preëminently a region of waterways, and including the great Laurentian mountain range. In this area are found the other great river systems, the Nelson and the Mackenzie. From the western edge of the Prairie to the Pacific coast is a distance of 400 miles, and within this area is contained the Rocky Mountains and the Gold and Cascade Ranges, whose summits are from 4,000 to 16,000 feet high, the country being on the whole densely wooded. The climate in the eastern and central portions of the Dominion presents greater extremes of cold and heat than in corresponding latitudes in Europe, but in the south-western portion of the Prairie Region and the southern portions of the Pacific slope the climate is milder. Spring, summer, and autumn are of about seven to eight months' duration, and the winter four to five months. The country possesses great mineral wealth, and coal, gold, silver, copper, nickel, lead, petroleum, and asbestos are produced, while iron, phosphates, salt, graphite, etc., occur; the total value of the minerals produced in 1906 was about $80,000,000. The soil is generally fertile; all the products of the temperate zone are cultivated. In 1881 there were thirty-five cities and towns of 5,000 inhabitants and upwards, having a total population of 660,040; in 1901 there were sixty-two of such cities and towns, and their total population was about 1,330,000. Montreal has a population of 267,730 (or with suburbs, over 350,000), and Toronto, the capital of Ontario, has over 272,600 inhabitants. Ottawa had, in 1907, 69,756 inhabitants; Winnipeg, in Manitoba, 90,234; Quebec, 68,840; Vancouver, in British Columbia, over 26,000; and the city of Dawson, the "business center" of the Klondike gold region, which was a barren waste in 1897, had, in 1901, a population of 9,142. In facilities for communication, Canada is unrivaled. The St. Lawrence, with its lakes, puts a great part of it in connection at once with the most commercial portion of the United States and with the open ocean. The navigation of this great water-system has been greatly assisted by numerous and extensive canals, of which the Cornwall, Rideau, and the Welland are the most important. There is, besides, an immense and steadily increasing net-work of railroads embracing several trans-continental lines. The Victoria Bridge, by which the Grand Trunk crosses the St. Lawrence at Montreal, is one of the wonders of the world. The completion of the Canadian Pacific Railroad, in 1885, gave railroad communication between or westward from Montreal, its eastern terminus, to Vancouver, in British Columbia, a distance of 2,893 miles, or from Quebec, a distance of 3,039 miles.

Canossa (kä-nos' sä), a town northwest of Bologna, in the courtyard of the castle of which the Emperor Henry IV. stood three days in the cold, in January 1077, bareheaded and barefooted, waiting for Pope Gregory VII. to remove from him the sentence of excommunication.

Canton, a large commercial city and port in the south of China, and capital of the maritime province of Kwang-tung, forms an irregular square, and is divided by a wall into the North and South, or Old and New City. The former is inhabited by the Tartar population, the latter by Chinese; and between the two communication is maintained by four gates in the separating wall. Many of the streets are devoted to distinct trades; thus there is "Carpenter" Street, "Apothecary" Street, etc. The Joss-houses, Buddhist Temples, are said to be about 124 in number. The largest of these, on Honam Island, covers seven acres, and has 175 priests attached. It is called "Hae Chwang Sze," or "The Temple of the Ocean Banner." Another famous structure is "The Temple of the Five Hundred Gods," situated in the western suburbs. Until 1843 all the legitimate foreign trade of China centered at Canton, and its amount at one time exceeded $100,000,000 annually; but since other ports in the empire have been opened to foreigners this amount has decreased by nearly one half. Tea and silks are the staple articles of export to Europe, etc., after which come the precious metals, cassia, sugar, and many minor articles; population, 1,800,000.

Cape Colony, a British colony at the southern extremity of Africa, washed on the west, south, and east by the ocean. The colony extends about 450 miles from north to south and 600 from east to west; the coast line is about 1,300 miles. The area is 276,000 square miles; the population, 2,433,000.

The colony is better adapted for pasturage than for agriculture. All kinds of vegetables and pot herbs, and all the fruits of temperate climates thrive excellently, and fruits, dried and preserved, are exported. The vine is cultivated, and some excellent wines are made.

Sheep-rearing is the most important industry, and wool is the chief export (although surpassed in value by diamonds). Cattle-breeding is carried on to some extent, especially along the coasts and in the east and north districts. There are no manufactures of any importance.

The European inhabitants consist in part of English, Scottish, and Irish settlers and their descendants, but the majority are of Dutch origin, while there are also a considerable number of German origin. The colored people are chiefly Hottentots, Kaffirs, Bechuanas, Basutos, Griquas, Malays, and a mixed race, the offspring of black women and white fathers.

The constitution which was formed under the acts passed in the years 1853, 1865, and 1872 vests the executive in the governor and an executive council composed of office-holders appointed by the crown. The legislative power is in the hands of a legislative council of twenty-three members, elected for seven years, and a house or assembly of ninety-five members, elected for a term of five years.

The Dutch, who had early fixed upon the Cape as a watering-place for their ships, first colonized it under Van Riebeeck, in 1652. It was captured by the British in 1795, restored at the peace of Amiens (1802), and again taken in 1806. From this time it has remained in the possession of Great Britain, to which it was formally assigned in 1815, along with Dutch Guiana. Subsequently the area of the colony was gradually enlarged by the annexation of surrounding districts.

Capitol (Lat. Capitolium), the great temple dedicated to Jupiter on the Tarpeian or Capitoline Hill at Rome. It is said to have been called the Capitolium, because a human head (caput) was found in digging the foundations. It was commenced by Tarquinius Priscus, and finished by Tarquinius Superbus, 507 B. C.; but it was three times burnt down, and, after its third destruction in the reign of Titus, it was again rebuilt by Domitian. The capitol included not only a temple to Jupiter, but one to each of his attendant deities, Juno and Minerva. It was one of the most imposing buildings in Rome. The consuls, on entering upon their office, offered sacrifices and took their vows in the capitol; and it was to the capitol that the victorious general on his return to the city, was carried, in his triumphal car, to return thanks for his victories. From that portion of the hill called the Tarpeian Rock, state criminals were thrown down. The modern building on the site, and partly on the foundations, of the ancient capitol, was erected from the designs of Michael Angelo.

Capri (kăh'pre.) (Anc. Capræe.) A beautiful island in the Mediterranean, lying near the south entrance to the Neapolitan Gulf, about twenty miles from the city of Naples. It produces a good light wine. The island is covered with remains of antiquity, including the ruins of the villa of Tiberius, the Roman Emperor.

Caracas, the capital of the Republic of Venezuela, in South America. It stands a few miles from the northern coast of Venezuela, at an elevation of nearly 3,000 feet above the sea. Its climate is healthy, but earthquakes are frequent in the vicinity. In 1812, nearly the whole of the city was destroyed by an earthquake, and 12,000 persons are said to have perished. The population of the city is 73,000.

Carisbrooke, a village in the Isle of Wight, about one mile south of Newport, and celebrated for its castle, which dates originally from the Sixth Century. In this castle (now in ruins) Charles I. was confined, and, after his execution, his two youngest children were also confined in the castle, and the Princess Elizabeth died there. The population of the parish is about 8,000.

Carlsbad (kărlz'băd.) [Ger., "Charles' Bath."] A town and fashionable spa of the Austrian empire, province Bohemia, seventy-two miles west-northwest of Prague. It is finely built and romantically situated; its principal spring, the Sprudel, is the hottest in Europe, having a temperature of 165° Fahrenheit. Population, 16,000.

Carmel, Mount, a mountain ridge of Palestine, which runs out into the Mediterranean, to the south of the Bay of Acrë. Its name means, "The Garden of God." On the summit of the ridge are oaks and pines, and, lower down laurels and olives. Near the top there is a monastery called Elias, after the prophet Elijah, the monks of which bear the name of Carmelites.

The order was probably founded in the Twelfth Century, but legend ascribes its foundation to Elijah, and the Virgin Mary is said to have been a Carmelite nun. One of the distinctions of the order is that they walk bare-footed. They exist at the present day in many Roman Catholic countries.

Caspian Sea, a great inland sea or lake, the largest in the world, forming a portion of the boundary between Europe and Asia. It is 730 miles long by from 150 to 270 miles broad. The surface of the Caspian is about eighty feet lower than the level of the Black Sea, which lies to the west, while the Sea of Aral, which lies to the east, is about forty feet above sea-level. Hence it is believed that at no distant period the Sea of Aral, the Caspian, and the Black Sea, formed one mass of water, which covered the intervening land. The water of the Caspian is salt, though less so than that of the ocean. The depth of its central portion is nearly 3,000 feet, but it is shallow round the shores. The Caspian has no tides, but its navigation is perilous because of violent storms. The Volga, the Ural, and many other rivers, fall into the Caspian; and by a canal, which unites the head waters of the Volga with the rivers Tvertza and Schlina, the Caspian is connected with the Baltic. The shallow northern basin, however, is frozen over during the entire winter. The sea abounds in fish, and seals and tortoises are found on its upper coasts. Its area is 170,000 square miles, or 20,000 square miles more than that of the British Isles. It was known to the Greeks and Romans under its present name (Caspium Mare), which was given to it from the Caspii, a people who inhabited its western shores.

Castile (kăs-tēl'), a central district of Spain, divided by the mountains of Castile into Old Castile in the north, and New Castile in the south: the former consisting of a high bare plateau, bounded by mountains on the north, and on the south, with a variable climate, yields wheat and good pasturage, and is rich in minerals; the latter, also tableland, has a richer soil, and yields richer produce, breeds horses and cattle, and contains besides the quicksilver mines of Almaden. Both were at one time occupied by the Moors, and were created into a kingdom in the Eleventh Century, and united to the crown of Spain in 1469 by the marriage of Ferdinand and Isabella.

Caucasus (The) (kau'kah-sūs), a great mountain range, stretching between the Caspian and the Black Seas, separating the two Russian provinces of Ciscaucasia and Transcaucasia, and forming part of the boundary between Europe and Asia. It has a continuous extent of about 700 miles, throwing off spurs, or lateral ridges, both towards Russia and Turkey in Asia. Its highest elevation is estimated at 18,500 feet, and its snow-limit at 11,000 feet. The Caucasus is generally remarkable for the picturesqueness of its scenery, and the wild independence of the tribes dwelling among its gorges.

Cenis (sě-nē'), a mountain belonging to the Graian Alps, between Savoy and Piedmont, 11,755 feet high. It is famous for the winding road constructed by Napoleon I., which leads over it from France to Italy, and for an immense railway tunnel, which, after nearly fourteen years' labor, was finished in 1871. The Mount Cenis Pass is 6,765 feet above the level of the sea, whereas the elevation of the entrance to the tunnel on the side of Savoy is only 3,801 feet, and that on the side of Piedmont 4,246 feet. The total length of the tunnel is nearly eight miles. The total cost amounted to about $12,000,000.

Cevennes (sā-vēn'), a mountain chain in the south of France, running northward between the basins of the Rhone and the Loire, as far as the Plateau of Langres, in the department of Haute Marne. The height of the Cevennes averages from 2,000 to 3,000 feet, but Mont Mézen, near the source of the Loire, reaches a height of 5,800 feet. The mountains are rich in minerals. The Cevennes are famous as the retreats of the Albigenes, Waldenses, and Camisards, during the religious wars of France.

Ceylon (sē-lōn'), an island belonging to Great Britain in the Indian Ocean, about sixty miles southeast of the southern extremity of Hindustan, from which it is separated by the Gulf of Manaar and Palk's Strait. Length, about 270 miles, north to south; average breadth 100 miles; area, 25,364 square miles.

Where the jungle has been cleared away and the land drained and cultivated, the country is perfectly healthy; where low wooded tracts, and flat marshy lands abound, covered with a rank, luxuriant vegetation, the climate is eminently insalubrious.

Most of the animals found on the opposite continent are native to this island, excepting the royal tiger, which does not exist here. Elephants are numerous and are esteemed for their superior strength and docility. Bears, buffaloes, leopards, jackals, monkeys, and wild hogs are numerous. Crocodiles, serpents, and reptiles of all sorts abound. Of the snake tribe, consisting of about twenty-six different species, six only are venomous. Among the insects are the leaf and stick insects, the ant-lion, the white ant, etc.

In the luxuriance of its vegetable productions, Ceylon rivals the islands of the Indian Archipelago, and in some respects bears a strong resemblance to them; its most valuable products are tea, rice, coffee, cinnamon, and the cocoanut. Tea is being widely cultivated. Tobacco is raised principally in the north district, and is of excellent quality. Indigo grows wild, but is not sought after.

Ceylon is one of the British crown colonies, its government being conducted by a governor and two councils, executive and legislative, of both of which the governor is president. The first is composed of six members, the other of seventeen members. The powers of the councils are limited, being wholly subservient to the governor, who can carry into effect any law without their concurrence. All laws must be approved by the Secretary of State for the Colonies before they can take effect. Any individual properly qualified may be appointed to the most responsible situation, without reference to service, nation, or religion, and native Singhalese have occupied some of the highest posts.

Chartreuse, La Grande, a famous monastery of France, in the department of Isere, fourteen miles north of Grenoble among lofty mountains, at an elevation of 3,281 feet above sea-level. The access to it is very difficult. It was built in 1084, but having been several times pillaged and burnt down, the present building was erected after 1676.

Cherbourg (shair'boorg), a fortified seaport and naval arsenal of France, department Manche, at the head of a bay of same name, 185 miles west-northwest of Paris. The fortifications here are of the most formidable character, and as a naval stronghold it may almost be considered impregnable. Cherbourg possesses a magnificent harbor for ships of war, constructed by Napoleon I., at an immense cost, besides dockyards, dry-docks, etc. The roads afford secure anchorage to 400 sail at a time, and are protected by a magnificent breakwater began in 1784, and completed by Napoleon III., in 1864. Population, 42,952.

Chicago, second largest city of the United States, embraces all Cook County, on the southwest shore of Lake Michigan, and on both sides of Chicago River. It stands on a level plain, and is surrounded by a beautiful and fertile country. The Chicago River and its two branches separate the city into three unequal divisions, known as the North, the South, and the West, connected by numerous bridges and two tunnels under the river. The streets are wide and are laid out at right angles, many of them being adorned by rows of fine forest trees. The site of the city was originally unhealthy from its lowness, but a large portion of it has been artificially heightened (even while occupied by buildings), by eight or ten feet. The public parks have an area of 2,000 acres. Among the chief buildings are the new city hall, and courthouse, the custom-house and post-office, and the chamber of commerce. There is a university and a large number of higher-class colleges and seminaries. To supply the town with water two tunnels have been constructed under Lake Michigan, and convey the pure water of that lake into the town, where it is pumped up to a height of 160 feet and distributed. There are also a number of artesian wells. From its position at the head of the great chain of the American lakes, and at the center of a net-work of railroads communicating with all parts of the Union, Chicago has always been more a commercial than a manufacturing city. There are extensive docks, basins, and other accommodation for shipping. The industries embrace iron-founding, brewing, distilling, leather, hats, sugar, tobacco, agricultural implements, steam-engines, boots and shoes. In commerce Chicago is only second to New York. It has an enormous trade in pork-packing, and is the greatest market for grain and timber in America. Other articles for which it is a center of trade are flour, provisions, wool, hides, soft goods, clothing. Before 1831 Chicago was a mere trading station. Its charter is dated March 4, 1837, its population being then 4,170, but since then it has advanced at an altogether extraordinary rate. On October 9, 1871, a great fire occurred which burned down a vast number of houses and rendered about 150,000 persons homeless and destitute.

But the energy of its inhabitants and its favorable situation enabled it to recover in a surprisingly short time. The World's Columbian Exhibition was held in Chicago in 1893. It celebrated Columbus' discovery of America. January 2, 1900, a ship and drainage canal was opened between this city and the Gulf; the cost was $35,000,000. Population, 1,990,750.

Chile (chil'e) [sometimes written Chili]. A southwestern republic of South America, forming a long, narrow strip of country lying between the Andes and the Pacific Ocean; mean breadth, from 110 to 120 miles. Chile is bounded north by Bolivia; east by the Argentine Republic and the Andes; southeast and south by Patagonia and the Gulf of Ancud, separating it from Chiloe; and west by the Pacific. The backbone of this country is found in the Great Cordillera of the Andes, here attaining an average height of 14,000 feet, many of whose peaks are volcanic, notably that of Aconcagua (the highest Andean summit), which has an altitude of 23,083 feet above the sea. The coast line presents steep and rocky shores, broken into by some excellent harbors. The rivers and lagoons are so small as to be undeserving of mention. Climate is healthful, as a whole; a scarcity of rain is, however, often felt. Earthquakes are of common occurrence. Chile is one bed of metals; silver, gold, lead, and iron are found largely and worked; copper, however, is the principal resource of the national wealth, and is mined on an immense scale. Sulphur, antimony, zinc, manganese, alum, nitre, salt, coal, etc., are other mineral items which influence a large exportation. The soil is of varying fertility, most fertile towards the south and the foothills of the Andes, where luxuriant vegetation flourishes. Many hard woods are made useful, instead of iron, and the fruits of the temperate zone thrive excellently. The bulk of commercial transactions is carried on with Great Britain. The chief cities and towns are: Valparaiso, the chief port; Santiago, the capital; Valdivia, Concepcion, and Talca.

China, or The Chinese Empire. A country of Asia, occupying the vast elevated plateau known as Eastern High Asia. The Chinese Empire has an area of more than 4,000,000 square miles, one-fourth of the whole of Asia. It embraces China proper, Manchuria, Mongolia, and Tibet. China proper is bounded on the north by Mongolia, and Manchuria; on the west by Mongolia, Tibet, and Burmah; on the south by Burmah, Anam, and the China Sea; and on the east by the Pacific Ocean, the Yellow Sea, and Corea. It contains several mountain ranges, from which proceed the Hoang-Ho, the Yangtse-kiang, the Peiho, and the Canton Rivers. The climate of China is very varied, and in some parts of the country there is excessively cold winter, followed by excessively hot summer; but the soil is generally productive, the mountains are clothed with timber, and the hillsides and the plains are laid out in rice fields and gardens. Agriculture is the chief occupation of the people, and it is conducted by them with great skill and assiduity. Besides rice, which is grown most extensively in the south, wheat and barley are cultivated in the north, and the tea plant in the maritime provinces, the exports of tea alone amounting in value to $50,000,000 a year. Cotton is also grown in the neighborhood of Shanghai. In some of their manufactures, the Chinese have never been surpassed. Their silks and porcelains have always been famous, and in certain arts requiring patience and ingenuity, such as the making of cardcases, snuffboxes, and fans, they are equaled only by the Japanese. There is a great caravan trade carried on with Russia and Farther India, and a large traffic by sea with British India, North and South America, Great Britain, and the other countries of Europe. From India opium is imported, and its effects upon the people is most deleterious. Internal communication is carried on chiefly by means of rivers, and of a Grand Canal which, commencing at the city of Hang-kow, runs northward for a distance of seven hundred miles. Railways and telegraphs, however, are now being generally introduced, and at the beginning of 1908, more than thirty lines of railways were under construction. The provinces of China are: Chihli, Shantung, Kiangsu, Chehkiang, Fukien, Kwangtung, Shensi, Anhwei, Honan, Shansi, Kansu, Szechuen, Hupeh, Kwang-si, Hunan, Kiangsi, Kweichow, and Yunnan. The capital of China proper and of the entire empire is Peking. Other towns of importance are Nanking, Canton, Shanghai, Ning-po, Fuchau, Amoy, Hang-kow, Kin-te-ching, and Chee-foo.

Cincinnati, the "Queen City of the West," is situated in the southwest part of Ohio, on the northern shore of the Ohio River. The location is fine, and the suburbs are not surpassed for beauty. This great emporium of the Central States is an aggregation of towns that have merged into one. It is composite also as to population, which is derived from many nations. The German element is very large. Here are established a famous college of music and a richly endowed art school. Five bridges connect Cincinnati with the cities of Covington, Newport, and Ludlow on the Kentucky shore. The architectural achievements of the city are striking for splendor and variety. Among its other leading industries are pork-packing, brewing, distilling, and manufactures of iron, stone, wood, clothing, food-products, tobacco, soap, jewelry, and drugs. Among its interesting institutions are the university, public library, art museum, historical society, society of natural history, zoological garden, industrial exposition, May musical festival, city armory, medical colleges, hospitals, and crematory. Cincinnati is the site of one of the earliest astronomical observatories in the United States, founded about the same time as that of Harvard College and the Naval Observatory. Population, 325,902.

Circassia, a country of Asia, comprehending the north-western division of the Caucasus, between the shores of the Black and Caspian seas. The whole country is mountainous. For nearly forty years the Circassians maintained a brave struggle against the encroachments of the Russians, but were finally defeated, with the rest of the inhabitants of the Caucasus, in 1864, a defeat which led practically to their extinction as a nation. After the close of the war, large numbers of them emigrated to Asia Minor and other provinces of Turkey. The women of Circassia have long been famous for their beauty.

Cleveland, the first city in Ohio in population, is situated on the south shore of Lake Erie, at the mouth of the Cuyahoga River. Its situation is central to great deposits of coal, iron ore, petroleum, and limestone. The city has a harbor at the mouth of the river giving safe anchorage for a large number of ships. Great breakwaters run out on each side of the river, forming commodious eastern and western harbors. The abundance of trees gives it the name of "The Forest City." The Cuyahoga is spanned by several bridges, and in particular by the Viaduct, an elevated street and bridge erected at great expense. Among the buildings are the United States building, city hall, Case Hall, medical college, railway depôt, etc. Cleveland is an important railway center, has an extensive lake traffic, and large manufactures, especially in iron and steel; petroleum-refining and pork-packing being also important industries. There is a harbor of refuge constructed by government. Population, 437,114.

Cologne (ko-lōn') [Ger. Köln]. An ancient city of Prussia, formerly capital of an independent electorate of same name, and now of the Rhine provinces. It connects by a magnificent iron bridge with Deutz on the opposite bank of the Rhine, is strongly fortified, and presents architecturally a fine coup d'œil of mediæval quaintness. Its cathedral, begun about 1248, finished in 1880, at a cost of $10,000,000, is the most imposing structure in Germany and the most imposing Gothic edifice in the world. Cologne has an extensive commerce, and is the chief entrepôt between the Netherlands and the cities of Germany. Cologne was founded by the Romans, and reached the height of its prosperity during the Middle Ages, and the subsequent zenith of the Hanseatic League. Population, 432,835.

Colombia, a Republic of South America; area 513,938 squares miles; population (according to government estimate), 4,000,000; capital, Bogota.

The surface of the country is extremely varied, with lofty mountains in the west, and vast plains in the east scarcely above the level of the sea.

Columbia possesses all the climates of the world; perpetual snows cover the summits of the Cordilleras, while the valleys abound in the rich vegetation of the tropics. In the north departments and in the immense llanos of the east great herds of cattle, descended from those imported by the Spaniards, are reared; in the central districts shorthorns and other English, Dutch, and Norman cattle and horses have been introduced, and are largely raised throughout the temperate zone. Among the natural mineral products are gold, silver, iron, copper, lead, coal, sulphur, zinc, antimony, arsenic, cinnabar, rock-salt, crystal, granite, marble, lime, gypsum, jet, amethysts, rubies, porphyry, and jasper; while much of the world's platinum is obtained from the upper San Juan, and the principal source of the finest emeralds is at Muzo in Boyaca.

Colombo, the capital of the island of Ceylon, on the west coast of the island, and one of the chief ports of Southern India. It is strongly fortified both toward the land and the sea, and its suburbs are very attractive and generally well built. The native population live, however, for the most part in the old town, or Black Town, in which many of the houses are little more than mud huts; and there are many similar places of abode outside the walls. Coffee and oils are among the chief products of Colombo, and cinnamon is largely exported. The present name of the town was given to it by the Portuguese in honor of Christopher Columbus. Population, 158,000.

Constantinople, called by the Turks Stamboul, the capital of the Turkish Empire. It is said to have been founded in the Seventh Century before Christ, and it retained its name of Byzantium, derived from its founder, till its conquest (A. D. 330) by Constantine the Great, who built a new city on the site, and gave to it its present name. It came into the hands of the Turks in 1453. Situated on an arm of the sea called the Golden Horn, on the European side of the Bosphorus or Strait of Constantinople, the city holds a splendid position, and its appearance from the sea is very striking; but the streets are for the most part narrow and dirty, and the houses are mostly low, being built of wood and earth. It contains, however, some fine public buildings, such as the Seraglio, or Imperial Palace, and the Cathedral of St. Sophia, now converted into a mosque. Many of the mosques are very beautiful, and are generally surrounded with trees and gardens. The Golden Horn, on the north side of the city, forms one of the finest harbors in the world. On the northeast side of the harbor are the suburbs of Galata and Pera, where the English, the French, and other Europeans reside. Galata is the seat of the commercial establishments, Pera that of the diplomatic bodies. The inhabitants of Stamboul itself are Turks, Armenians, Greeks, and Jews, who have each particular quarters allotted to them. The objects of greatest attraction in Stamboul are the bazaars, or market-places, the fountains, and the baths. The Seraglio stands on the eastern side of the city, and is surrounded by public offices and government buildings, being altogether three miles in circumference. The principal entrance to the palace is called "the Porte." There are upwards of 350 mosques in Constantinople, and about thirty-six Greek, Roman Catholic, and Protestant churches. There are more than 130 public baths in the city, and 180 khans or lodging houses of great size, chiefly occupied by foreigners. Omnibuses and tramways have been introduced, and on the Pera side of the city many of the streets are well lighted. The old walls of the city are thirteen miles in circumference. Population about 1,125,000.

Corinth, a city of Ancient Greece, the capital of a small, but wealthy and powerful district in the Peloponnesus. It lay on the southeast of the "Gulf of Corinth," which stretches along the northern shore of the Peloponnesus; and its position on the "Isthmus of Corinth," which connects the Peloponnesus with the more northerly part of Greece, made it a place of great importance, and the emporium of the trade between Europe and Asia. The city was taken and destroyed by the Romans, about the middle of the Second Century before Christ. It was afterwards, in the First Century of our era, made into a Roman colony, and regained much of its former wealth, which led to its population becoming once more famed for their luxuriousness and licentiousness. Little now remains of the city except the ruins of a Doric temple, believed to be one of the earliest existing specimens of that style of architecture. The modern town is of no importance.

Cossacks, a people inhabiting those parts of the Russian Empire which border on the northern dominions of Turkey, Poland, and the southern confines of Siberia. Both the name and the origin of this people are involved in great uncertainty, but they are believed to be of a mixed Caucasian and Tartar race. The country of the Don Cossacks, or Cossacks of the Don, to the north of the Sea of Azov and Caucasia, has an area of about 62,000 square miles, with a population of about 1,100,000. They pay no taxes to the government, but, in lieu of this, every Cossack of the Don, from 15 to 60 years of age, is bound to render military service. Every Cossack is obliged to equip, clothe, and arm himself at his own expense, and to keep his horse. The number of Don Cossacks in military service is computed at 66,000; and there are, besides, the Cossacks on the Black Sea, the Great Russian Cossacks on the Caucasian Line, the Ural Cossacks, the Orenburg Cossacks, the Siberian Cossacks, and the Bashkir Cossacks, the total number of Cossacks in military service being estimated at about 330,000, all of whom are fully organized, and are supposed to be prepared to enter the field, on being summoned, in the course of ten days. They are thus the most important part of the irregular troops of Russia, but otherwise they maintain considerable independence.

Cotopaxi (kō-tō-păx'ī), the most remarkable volcanic mountain of the Andes, in Ecuador, about sixty miles northeast of Chimborazo; latitude $0^{\circ} 43'$ south; longitude $78^{\circ} 40'$ west; altitude 19,613 feet. It is the most beautiful of the colossal summits of the Andes, being a perfectly symmetrical, truncated cone, presenting a uniform, unfurrowed field of snow of resplendent brightness. Several terrific eruptions of it occurred in the course of the Eighteenth and the beginning of the Nineteenth Century.

Coventry (kuv'en-trī), a city in England, county of Warwick, eighty-five miles northwest of London. It was formerly surrounded with lofty walls and had twelve gates, and was the see of a bishop early conjoined with Lichfield. Parliaments were convened here by the earlier monarchs of England. Pageants and processions were celebrated in old times, and a remnant of these still exists in the processional show in honor of Lady Godiva. Population, 69,877.

Cracow (krā'kō), the old capital of Poland, in 1815–1846 capital of a republic of the same name now forming part of Austrian Galicia; is on the left bank of the Vistula, where it becomes navigable, and consists of Cracow proper or the old city, and several suburbs. It is the see of a bishop, is well built and regularly fortified. The cathedral, a fine old Gothic edifice, contains monuments of many Polish kings, of Kosciusko, etc. The university was founded in 1364, but gradually fell into decay, and was reorganized in 1817. It has a library of 300,000 volumes. On a hill near the town stands the monument of Kosciusko, 120 feet high. Population, 100,520.

Crecy (krē'se), or Cressy, a small town of France, in the department of Somme, about twelve miles northeast of Abbeville, celebrated on account of the Battle of Crecy, won by Edward III., of England, over the French, under the Count of Alençon, August 26, 1346. This battle was won by the prowess of the Black Prince under command of Edward III.; and the crest now used by the Princes of Wales (three ostrich feathers, with the motto, "Ich dien," I serve) is commonly said to have been adopted by the Black Prince after this victory, in which the King of Bohemia, to whom the crest belonged, was slain. Population about 1,500.

Cronstadt (krōn'stāt), a maritime fortress of Russia, about twenty miles west of St. Petersburg, in the narrowest part of the Gulf of Finland, opposite to the mouth of the Neva, on a long, narrow, rocky island, forming, both by its position and the strength of its fortifications, the bulwark of the capital, and being the most important naval station of the Empire. It was founded by Peter the Great, in 1710, and used to be the commercial port of St. Petersburg, but since the construction of a canal, giving large vessels direct access to the capital, it has lost this position.

Cuba, the largest and most westerly of the West Indies. It stretches in the west, with a breadth varying from thirty miles to 160 miles, a coast-line of 1,976 miles, and an area of about 45,872 square miles, including adjacent islands (of which the Isle of Pines is the largest) and bays. Only about one-third of the coastline is accessible to vessels, the remainder being beset by reefs and banks. The shores, low and flat, are liable to inundations, but there are numerous excellent havens. A watershed running lengthwise through the islands, rises into mountainous heights only in the southeast, where are the Sierra de Mæstra, shooting up in the Pico de Tarquinto to 8,400 feet, and the Sierra del Cobre (copper). The mountains, composed of granite overlaid with calcareous rocks, and containing minerals, especially copper and iron, are clothed in almost perennial verdure, wooded to the summits. The limestone rocks abound in caverns, with magnificent stalactites. Mineral waters are plentiful. The rivers, running north and south, are navigable for only a few miles by small boats, but are very serviceable for irrigation of the plantations, and supply excellent drinking water. The climate, more temperate than in the other West Indian Islands, is salubrious in the elevated interior, but the coasts are the haunt of fever and ague. No month of the year is free from rain, the greatest rainfall being in May, June, and July. Earthquakes are frequent in the east. Hurricanes, less frequent than in Jamaica, sometimes cause widespread desolation.

The soil of Cuba is a marvel of richness, and a large part is still covered with virgin forest. The vegetation of Cuba also includes tamarinds, palms, ferns, lianas, etc. Among the cultivated products are sugar, tobacco, coffee, cacao, rice, maize, cotton, esculent roots, and tropical fruits. Among the animals there is a species of tailless rat peculiar to Cuba, and an abundance of birds. Of noxious animals and insects there are the crocodile, scorpion, and mosquitoes. The rivers and seas are well stocked with fish, the turtle abounding in the shallows and sandy places of the beach. The staple production of the island is sugar. In a single year Cuba has produced over 11,000,000 tons of this article for export.

Tobacco ranks next to sugar as a staple. Cuba produces the standard quality of cigar leaf, owing to the exquisite adaptation of the soil and climate to the development of the plant. The normal production is 6,000,000 pounds of leaf, and 130,000,000 cigars. The mineral wealth of Cuba is largely in the copper mines. There are almost inexhaustible deposits of this metal, part of which are found in the mountains near the east end, known as the Sierra del Cobre, or Copper Mountains. Here a great part of the ore taken out yields sixty per cent. of pure metal. Cuba has asphalt deposits rivaling those of Trinidad, for street paving. Iron ores abound. In the neighborhood of Santiago there are mountains of metal, and for a considerable period the Juragua and Daiquiri companies (American) shipped from 30,000 to 50,000 tons of the ore per month to the United States. Oranges of exquisite flavor grow spontaneously in all parts of the island, though no attention is paid to their culture or exportation. There are cocoanuts, six kinds of bananas, and such fruits as guavas, zapotes, anonas, guanabanas, and tamarinds. There are thirty-two species of the palm tree, the woods and the leaves of the majority of which could be transformed into a profitable article of commerce, but so far only two have been utilized, the "yarey" palm, whose leaves are used in the United States for the manufacture of hats and baskets, and the "palma real" (royal palm), from which durable boards are made, which last much longer than those of the yellow pine and are largely used in the construction of houses.

There are ten railway companies in Cuba, which operate upward of 1,000 miles of main line, and there are also private branch lines to all the important sugar estates.

There are over 2,300 miles of telegraph line in operation, all the property of the government, which also owns the telephones, leasing both systems to private corporations.

Population, 1,786,207.

Cuzco, an inland city of Peru, capital of a department of the same name, and formerly capital of the Empire of the Incas, about 400 miles southeast of Lima. According to tradition, this town was founded in 1043 by Manco Capac, the first Inca of Peru. The grandeur and magnificence of the edifices, of its fortress, and of the Temple of the Sun, struck the Spaniards with astonishment in 1534, when the city was taken by Francis Pizarro. On the hill toward the north are yet seen the ruins of a fortress built by the Incas, and which has a communication, by means of subterranean passages, with three forts built in the walls of Cuzco. All the descendants of the Incas resided in a particular quarter of the city. Population, 22,000.

Czechs (cheks), the extreme western branch of the great Slavonic family of races. The Czechs have their headquarters in Bohemia, where they arrived in the Fifth Century. The origin of the name is unknown. The total number of the Czechs is about 6,000,000, nearly all of whom live in the Austrian Empire. The Czechs proper, in Bohemia, number about 2,700,000. They speak a Slavonic dialect of great antiquity and of high scientific cultivation. The Czech language is distinguished as highly inflectional. Like the Greek, it has a dual number, and its manifold declensions, tenses, and participial formations, with their subtle shapes of distinction, give the language a complex grammatical structure. The alphabet consists of forty-two letters. In musical value the Czech comes next to Italian.

Danube, a celebrated river of Europe, originates in two small streams rising in the Schwarzwald, or Black Forest, in Baden, and uniting at Donaueschen. The direct distance from source to mouth of the Danube is about 1,000 miles, and its total length, including windings, about 1,640 miles. The Danube is navigable for steamers up the Regensburg (Ratisbon) nearly 1,500 miles from its mouth.

Dardanelles (the ancient Hellespont), the narrow strait between Europe and Asia, connecting the Grecian Archipelago with the Sea of Marmora. The strait is about forty miles in length. Its western entrance is two miles wide, but at its narrowest part it is only three-quarters of a mile wide; and here stood the castles of the Dardanelles (Dardanus), from which the strait derived its name.

Date Line, an arbitrary line drawn on a map from north to south, on the one side of which it is to-day and on the other to-morrow, even in places not a mile apart. When ships cross this line they drop or repeat a day. The international date line describes the following course: starting at the North Pole it passes through Bering Strait, then slants to the west to clear the long horn formed by the Aleutian chain of islands and give them the same day as the United States, to which they belong. This accomplished, it returns to the 180th meridian and drops south into the tropics, keeping far to the east of the Japanese group and the Philippines till it approaches the latitude of the Fiji Islands. As these and some of the neighboring groups belong to Great Britain and do business chiefly with her Australian colonies, the date line here makes a sudden swerve to the east, so as not to embarrass the local commerce with a change of day.

Dead Sea, The, a lake of Palestine, about twenty miles north of Jerusalem. It is called by the Arabs "Bahr Loot," or "Sea of Lot"; is about thirty-five miles long, and from ten to twelve broad, with a depth of 220 fathoms, and its surface 1,312 feet below the level of the Mediterranean. The waters of the Dead Sea are intensely salt, of great specific gravity, and have no perceptible outlet; in the north it receives the waters of the Jordan.

Denmark, a kingdom of Northern Europe, is composed of a peninsular portion, and an extensive archipelago, lying east of it, with a few scattered islands on its west side. The peninsular portion is composed of Jutland, and measures, north to south, 185 miles, with a breadth varying from forty miles to 108 miles. Besides these territories, Denmark possesses the Faroe Islands and Iceland, in the North Atlantic Ocean, and Greenland in the Arctic regions, also the Danish West Indies. Denmark has no large rivers. Intercourse between the various islands and parts of the kingdom separated from each other by water is necessarily kept up by means of water communication, regular ferries being established at numerous points. Denmark is well supplied with excellent sea-ports, the most important being Copenhagen, Aalborg, Aarhus, and Randers. Horses and cattle are reared in great numbers, and both are excellent. Large flocks of sheep are kept; but rather for the flesh than the wool, which is coarse and short. Swine are also reared to a great extent. Although not particularly favored by nature, Denmark is yet preëminently an agricultural country. The land is greatly subdivided, as the law interdicts the union of small farms into larger, and encourages the division of landed property. The kinds of grain most largely cultivated are barley, oats, rye, and wheat; the greatest area being occupied by oats, the second by barley. The fisheries were formerly a more important branch of national industry than now.

Detroit, metropolis of Michigan, is situated on the Detroit River, about eighteen miles from Lake Erie, and four miles from Lake St. Clair. It has a water front of eight miles; steamship communication with the principal ports on the Great Lakes; and ferries to Windsor on the Canadian side. The river at this point is known as the "Dardanelles of the New World," leading from one great lake to another and affording an excellent harbor. Detroit has many magnificent public parks, and over $500,000 is expended annually for their maintenance. The largest and most beautiful is Belle Isle, an island of 700 acres at the entrance of Lake St. Clair. This park is an immense pleasure ground and offers all sorts of amusements. No city of its size in the country surpasses Detroit in the number, beauty, and substantial quality of its public and business buildings. Among the most noteworthy are the Chamber of Commerce, Majestic, Union Trust, Hammond, municipal buildings, county courthouse, city hall, the post-office, built at a cost of $2,000,000, Light Guard Armory, art museum, Central High School, and Masonic Temple. Near the Campus Martius is the public library, with 150,000 volumes. In front of the city hall stands a magnificent soldiers' and sailors' monument. Other points of interest are Fort Wayne, the Bagley Fountain, Evacuation Day Tablet, the old home of General Grant, and relics of Perry's victory on Lake Erie. Detroit is an extensive manufacturing and commercial city. Population, 325,563.

Dresden, the capital of the kingdom of Saxony, is situated in a beautiful valley on both sides of the River Elbe. Among the chief edifices, besides several of the churches, are the museum (joined on to an older range of buildings called the Zwinger), a beautiful building containing a famous picture gallery and other treasures; and the Japanese Palace (Augusteum) containing the royal library of from 300,000 to 400,000 volumes. The city is distinguished for its excellent educational, literary, and artistic institutions, among which are the Polytechnic School, the Conservatory and School of Music, the Academy of Fine Arts, etc. The manufactures are important and various in character; the china, however, for which the city is famed, is made chiefly at Meissen, fourteen miles distant. The commerce is considerable, and has greatly increased since the development of the railway system. The chief glory of Dresden is the gallery of pictures, one of the finest in the world. The pictures number about 25,000, and in particular comprise many fine specimens of the Italian, Dutch, and Flemish schools. The city suffered severely in the Thirty Years' War, and also in 1813, when it was the headquarters of Napoleon's army. It was occupied by the Prussians in 1866, but was evacuated in the following spring. Population, 516,996.

Dublin (Irish, Dubh-linn, "black pool"), the capital of Ireland, stands on the River Liffey, where it disembogues into Dublin Bay. Much of Dublin is built on land reclaimed from the sea, a work which still continues; and the ground is generally flat, with a very few undulations. The river, running from east to west, divides the city into two almost equal portions. The aristocratic parts are the southeast and northeast, containing many beautiful squares, with splendid streets and terraces. The center and the northwest quarter are the great emporiums of trade and the residence of the middle classes. The southwest division, part of which is called the "Liberties," once the seat of the silk trade, is the most filthy and degraded portion of the city. The streets in this quarter are narrow, crooked, and irregular, while in the fashionable quarter they possess a totally opposite character. The city is surrounded by a "Circular Road," of nearly nine miles in length, forming a favorite drive and promenade. Population, 290,638.

Edinburgh, capital of Scotland, and chief town of Mid-Lothian, occupies a picturesque situation on a cluster of eminences at a distance of about one and one-half miles from the Firth of Forth. Its admirable position has induced the comparison with Athens, from which, as well as from its literary fame, it takes the title "Modern Athens." The Gaelic name of the city is "Dunedin." A picturesque castle crowns the highest point in the city. Holyrood Abbey and palace in the low ground east of the city have great historic interest. Edinburgh is the residence of considerable numbers of the Scottish landed gentry, and its society is regarded as unusually polished, from the predominance of the professional and literary elements in its composition. Its medical practitioners — surgeons and physicians — have a high reputation. Its university and medical schools, its high school, and its various other educational institutes have a high repute. Population, 316,479.

Egypt is a country in the northeast of Africa, whose territory extends up the valley of the Nile as far as the Equator, embracing Nubia, Ethiopia, Darfur, etc. Egypt proper extends from the mouth of the Nile to the first cataract at Assuan, and is usually distinguished into Upper, Middle, and Lower Egypt, which last comprehends the Delta. The Delta begins just below Cairo, about ninety miles from the sea, and its greatest breadth is about eighty miles. It is this part of the country which is chiefly cultivated, its fertility being derived from the annual inundations caused by the overflow of the Nile. The rest of the country is mainly sandy desert, with some remarkable oases on the west of the Nile. The climate of Egypt is hot and dry, but not unhealthy. The date-palm, the acacia, and the sycamore, are scattered throughout the country; large plantations of roses are found in the province of Feiyoom; and the soil and climate are well suited for cotton, sugar, rice, indigo, cucumbers, melons, and onions, as well as for maize, wheat, and millet. There are no metals in Egypt, but salt, nitre, marble, red granite, oriental alabaster, and limestone, are found. The commerce of the country is very considerable, and centers chiefly in Alexandria, which suffered severely, however, in the war of 1882. The capital is Cairo, which is the largest city in Africa.

Eiffel Tower, a structure erected on the banks of the Seine in Paris, the loftiest in the world, being 984 feet in height, and visible from all parts of the city. It consists of three platforms, of which the first is as high as the towers of Notre Dame; the second as high as Strasbourg Cathedral spire; and the third, 863 feet. It was designed by Gustave Eiffel, and erected in 1887-89. There are cafés and restaurants on the first landing, and the ascent is by powerful elevators.

England, the most southern and richest portion of the island of Great Britain, is bounded north by Scotland, east by the German Ocean, south by the English Channel, and west by the Atlantic Ocean, the principality of Wales, and the Irish Sea. Maximum length, 425 miles; breadth, fluctuating between sixty-two and 280 miles; coast line, about 2,000 miles. Area, 50,812 square miles. The principal islands belonging to it are those of Man, Lundy, Scilly, Walney, Sheppey, Wight, Lindisfarne, and the Channel Islands. Chief rivers: Severn, Thames, Trent, Mersey, Ouse, Medway, Tyne, Dee, Tees, Wear, Derwent, and Eden. Lakes: Derwentwater, Ulleswater, Windermere, and Keswick. Estuaries: those of the Thames, Mersey, Humber, Severn, Dee, Southampton Water, and the Wash. It has numerous capes and headlands. Mountains: The principal mountains are those of Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Yorkshire, with the Cheviots on the Scottish border, the Derbyshire "Peak," and the Cotswolds in Gloucestershire. Numerous forests are spread over the country. Soil: The major part of the land is fertile and highly productive, owing to an admirable system of tillage; while well-furnished farm houses and comfortable cottages everywhere meet the eye, and evince that taste for neatness and rural beauty which is so characteristic of the nation. The same features, too, on a larger and grander scale, are found in the country-seas of the nobility and squirarchy. The climate is generally moist, but mild and healthful. Chief towns: London (capital of the British Empire), Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, Birmingham, Hull, Bristol, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Sheffield, Bath, Oxford, Carlisle, etc.

English Channel, the arm of sea which separates England from France, extending, on the English side, from Dover to Land's End; and on the French, from Calais to the island of Ushant. On the east it communicates with the German Ocean by the Strait of Dover, twenty-one miles wide; and on the west it opens into the Atlantic by an entrance about 100 miles wide. At its greatest breadth it is about 150 miles.

Erie Canal, the largest artificial waterway in the United States, serving to connect the Great Lakes with the sea. It begins at Buffalo on Lake Erie, and extends to the Hudson at Albany. It is 387 miles long; has in all seventy-two locks; a surface width of seventy feet, bottom width of forty-two feet, and depth of seven feet. It is carried over several large streams on stone aqueducts; was opened in 1825; and up to 1901 had cost for construction, enlargement, and maintenance $52,540,800. In November, 1903, the people of New York State voted to enlarge the canal so as to accommodate one-thousand-ton barges.

Erie, Lake, one of the great chain of North American lakes, between Lakes Huron and Ontario, about 265 miles long, 63½ miles broad at its center, from 200 to 270 feet deep at the deepest part; area, 7,750 square miles. The whole of its south shore is within the territory of the United States, and its north within that of Canada. It receives the waters of the upper lakes by Detroit River at its northwest extremity, and discharges its waters into Lake Ontario by the Niagara River at its northeast end. The Welland Canal enables vessels to pass from it to Lake Ontario.

Etna, or Ætna, Mount, the greatest volcano in Europe, a mountain in the province of Catania, Sicily; height, 9,652 feet. It rises immediately from the sea, has a circumference of more than 100 miles, and dominates the whole northeast of Sicily, having a number of towns and villages on its lower slopes. The top is covered with perpetual snow; midway down is the woody or forest region; at the foot is a region of orchards, vineyards, olive groves, etc. The eruptions of Etna have been numerous, and many of them destructive. That of 1169 overwhelmed Catania and buried 15,000 persons in the ruins. In 1669, the lava spread over the country for forty days, and 10,000 persons are estimated to have perished. In 1693, there was an earthquake during the eruption, when over 100,000 lives were lost. One eruption was in 1755, the year of the Lisbon earthquake. Among more recent eruptions are those of 1852, 1865, 1874, 1879, 1886, 1892.

Euphrates, or El Frat, a celebrated river of Western Asia, in Asiatic Turkey, having a double source in two streams rising in the Anti-Taurus Range. Its total length is about 1,750 miles, and the area of its basin, 260,000 square miles. It flows mainly in a southeast course through the great alluvial plains of Babylonia and Chaldæa till it falls into the Persian Gulf by several mouths, of which only one in Persian territory is navigable. About 100 miles from its mouth it is joined by the Tigris, when the united streams take the name of Shatt-el-Arab. It is navigable for about 1,200 miles, but navigation is somewhat impeded by rapids and shallows.

Faneuil Hall, a public hall in Boston, presented to the town by Peter Faneuil, in 1740, comprising a market-place on the first floor, and a town hall and other rooms above. In 1761, it was destroyed by fire. In 1763, it was rebuilt by the town; and, in 1775, during the British occupation of Boston, it was used for a theater. During the Revolutionary War this building was often used as a meeting place by the patriots.

Florence (Italian, Firenze; ancient, Florentia Tuscorum), a magnificent city of Italy, the capital of the province of Firenze, and formerly of Tuscany. It is situated in a beautiful valley on the banks of the Arno, 125 miles north of Rome. The two parts of the city are connected by six bridges, and the whole city was formerly surrounded by walls, upwards of six miles in extent. In architectural pretensions, Florence is one of the finest cities of Italy. Its cathedral, which dates from the close of the Thirteenth Century, is of great extent and magnificence; and it has many other churches only less interesting or beautiful. For its collections of paintings and sculpture Florence is scarcely excelled by any city of Europe. It has produced, perhaps, a greater number of celebrated men than any other continental city, including Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio, Michael Angelo, Leonardo da Vinci, and Galileo. The manufactures of Florence are few and of small importance. Satins, silks, jewelry, and mosaics, are, however, manufactured to some extent, and straw-plaiting occupies a considerable number of the lower orders of the people. As the capital of the province, Florence is still a place of some political importance. Population, 205,589.

France is a maritime country in the west of Europe, forming one of its most extensive, most populous, and most influential states. It is bounded north by the German Ocean and the Straits of Dover; northwest by the English Channel; west by the Atlantic, more especially that part of it called the Bay of Biscay; south by Spain and the Mediterranean Sea; east by Italy, Switzerland, and the German Territory of Alsace; northeast by German Lorraine, Luxemburg, and Belgium. On taking a survey of this great country it is impossible not to be struck with the advantages it derives from its position. It not only forms a continuous and compact whole, but, while protected by great natural barriers at most parts where it is connected with the continent, a long line of coast on the west and northwest gives it immediate access to the great ocean thoroughfare, while on the south its harbors in the Mediterranean secure to it a large share in the traffic of that important inland sea. The chief plains are those of Burgundy and of the oceanic district, embracing the lower basins of the Seine, Loire, and Garonne. There are four great mountain-chains — the Pyrenees, separating France from Spain; the Cevenno-Vosgian Range, formed of the Cevennes, running east and west between the Rhone and Loire, and the Vosges, running north and south between the Moselle and the new boundary-line; the Alps, which separate the Swiss Territory from the provinces of Savoy and Nice; and the Sardo-Corsican Range, which belongs, as the name implies, to the islands of Sardinia and Corsica. The French portion of the Alps now includes several of the highest mountains and most elevated passes of the range — as Mont Blanc, Mont Iseran, Mont Cenis, and the pass of Little St. Bernard, etc. In Corsica, the highest peak rises to an elevation of 9,000 feet. The grand watershed of France is the Cevenno-Vosgian chain, which determines the direction of the four great rivers, the Seine, the Loire, the Garonne, and the Rhone; the first three of which flow northwest into the Bay of Biscay or the English Channel, and the fourth into the Gulf of Lyons. France possesses only one lake of any importance, Le Grand-Lieu, a little to the south of Nantes, which has an area of about 14,300 acres; but the country abounds in salt marshes or ponds, more especially in the districts of Gascony, Roussillon, and Languedoc. France is peculiarly rich in mineral springs, of which there are said to be nearly 1,000 in use. It possesses one of the healthiest climates in Europe, although, owing to its great extent of area, very considerable diversities of temperature are to be met with. Of the vegetable products of France, which, from varied climatic and geognostic relations, are necessarily characterized by great abundance and diversity, the most generally cultivated are the cereals; the vine, chestnuts, olives, culinary fruits and vegetables, hops, beetroot for the manufacture of sugar, tobacco, madder, chicory. The cultivation of the mulberry tree derives importance from its bearing on the production of silk. The vine has, from a very early period, constituted one of the principal sources of the agricultural wealth of France. The choicest wines are grown in the Bordelais, Burgundy, and Champagne, but some excellent kinds are produced on the banks of the Loire and in some of the southern departments. The principal forest trees are the chestnut and beech on the central mountains, the oak and cork trees in the Pyrenees, and the fir in the Landes. The destruction of the national forests has been enormous within the last two centuries. The French government expends between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 francs annually in aiding by subsidies those engaged in the great fisheries. The chief mineral products of France are coal and iron, in the excavation of which nearly 250,000 men are now employed. France presents a great variety of geological formations, but although we meet with an almost complete succession of all the stratified and non-stratified formations they are distributed with great inequality. The best carpets are made in Aubusson, Abbeyville, and Amiens. Paris is the seat of industry for some of the most costly fabrics, as Gobelins, tapestry, shawls of great value, watches, clocks, articles of "vertu," carriages, philosophical instruments, etc. Sèvres stands unrivaled for its china and glass. St. Gobain and St. Quirin manufacture looking-glasses of the largest size. The great emporiums of trade are Paris, Lyons, St. Etienne, Lille, Rheims, Nîmes, Toulouse, etc.; and the most attractive maritime ports are Marseilles, Cette, Havre, Bordeaux, etc.

Ganges, a river of Hindustan, one of the greatest rivers of Asia, rising in the Himalaya Mountains, in Garhwal State, and formed by the junction of two head streams, the Bhagirathi and the Alaknanda, which unite at Deoprag, ten miles below Srinagar, 1,500 feet above sea-level. The Ganges is navigable for boats of a large size nearly 1,500 miles from its mouth. It is an imperative duty of the Hindus to bathe in the Ganges, or at least to wash themselves with its water, and to distribute alms, on certain days. The Hindus believe that whoever dies on its banks and drinks of its water before death is exempted from the necessity of returning into this world. Its water is a considerable article of commerce in the remoter parts of India.

Genoa, a city of Italy, is beautifully situated on the Gulf of Genoa, which lies to the south of Piedmont, and it stands at the foot and on the slope of the Ligurian Alps. In the old part of the city the streets are narrow and steep, but in the newer parts there are several spacious promenades; though generally the irregular rising ground on which the city is built has prevented any comprehensive plan of improvement, and it still retains much of that quaintness of architectural character for which it has long been celebrated. There are many magnificent churches in Genoa, of which the principal is the Duomo, or Cathedral, of St. Lorenzo. It is one of the chief ports of the Mediterranean, and there are local manufactures of cotton, silk, jewelry, etc. Genoa was the birthplace of Christopher Columbus, and of many other famous men. Population, 234,710.

German Empire, one of the great powers of Europe, consisting of a federation of semi-independent and other states, which occupy the greater portion of North-Central Europe. The following table shows the elements of which the German Empire as now constituted is made up:

The small island of Heligoland, now forming part of Prussia, was added to the empire in 1890.

Among the Germans themselves their country is known as "Deutschland"; to the French as "Allemagne"; while its Latin denomination is "Germania," whence the English name. Germany lies between the Baltic Sea, Denmark, and the North Sea on the north, and Switzerland and a part of Austria on the south, and between France, Belgium, and the Netherlands on the west, and the rest of Austria and Russia on the east. The northern part of Germany forms part of the great European plain, and is for the most part flat. Its soil is not very fertile, and extensive forests alternate with heaths, morasses, and small, shallow lakes. Central Germany may be described as hilly; its soil is fertile, and its scenery is often very picturesque. The greater part of Southern Germany is occupied by the plateau of Bavaria, which rises about 1,600 feet above the sea level, and increases in elevation towards the west, where it forms the Schwarz Wald, or Black Forest Range. Some of the mountain chains of Germany, especially the Harz Mountains and the Erzgebirge, are very rich in minerals. The chief rivers are the Rhine, Elbe, Oder, Vistula, and Upper Danube; others of less note are the Ems, Weser, Pregel, and Niemen. The climate of Germany is, on the whole, temperate and salubrious, though the winters are somewhat severe, and the Rhine is occasionally frozen as far south as Mannheim. Germany is rich in mineral products; cobalt, arsenic, sulphur, saltpeter, alum, gypsum, bismuth, pumice-stone, slate, ocher, emery, vitriol, are among the exports. Its vegetable products comprise a large portion of the European flora. All the ordinary cereals are extensively cultivated in the north. Its best wine-producing districts are the valleys of the Danube, Rhine, Main, Necker, and Moselle, which are also noted for the excellence of their fruits and vegetables. The principal seaports are Hamburg, Bremen, Lübeck, Altona, Cuxhaven, Bremerhaven, Stralsund, Stettin, Dantzig, Königsberg, and Memel. Inland, the chief commercial cities are Frankfurt-on-the-Main, Breslau, Leipzig, Cologne, Nuremberg, Elberfeld, Muhlhouse, Chemnitz, Mentz, and Augsburg.

Giants' Causeway (deriving its name from a legend that it was the commencement of a road to be constructed by giants across the channel to Scotland) is a natural pier or mole of columnar basalt, projecting from the north coast of Antrim, Ireland, into the North Channel, seven miles northeast of Portrush. It is part of an overlying mass of basalt from 300 to 500 feet in thickness, which covers almost the whole county of Antrim, and the east part of Londonderry.

Gibraltar, a seaport, and one of the strongest fortresses in Europe belonging to England, is situated in the south of Spain at the narrowest part of the Straits of Gibraltar, sixty-one miles southeast of Cadiz. The number and strength of the military works, and the vast galleries opened in the calcareous rock, excite admiration. The fortress, though taken by surprise by the British, in 1704, is considered impregnable. The sea-passage, extending from Cape Spartel, Spain, to Cape Ceuta, Africa, connects the Atlantic with the Mediterranean Sea; length about thirty-six miles; narrowest width between Europa Point and Ceuta, fifteen miles; broadening westward to twenty-four miles. A strong current sets in from the Atlantic through these straits, and it is supposed that a counter current passes underneath.

Glaciers are generally masses of consolidated snow, which by their own weight move slowly down the mountain where they have been accumulated. Their pace is seldom more than one inch per hour. Along their sides or over their surface are scattered accumulations of stone and detritus, which are called moraines. The Alpine Glaciers give birth to the five great rivers of Central Europe — the Rhine, Rhone, Po, Inn, and Adige. Glaciers move like rivers, faster in the middle and above than at the sides and along the bottom. The torrent of icy water that issues from the lower end of them is simply the result of melting. The largest glacier in the world is the Muir, in Alaska; the largest in Europe is the Justeldals Brae, in Norway.

Glasgow, the industrial metropolis of Scotland, is one of the largest and most important cities in the United Kingdom. It is situated on the Clyde, which affords great facilities for steam-boat traffic and shipping. The wharfs and docks afford extensive accommodation for vessels of every description. Glasgow is celebrated as the great Scottish emporium of trade and manufactures. The annual tonnage of the port is some 1,500,000 tons. The trade of Glasgow rose about the middle of the last century, and consisted chiefly of American and West Indian commerce. Since then the manufacture of cotton goods has risen to a great extent; as also woollens, silks, glass, iron, stone-ware, and chemicals.

Grand Canyon, a gorge through which the Colorado River flows in Arizona; sixty-five miles from Flagstaff. It is one of the natural wonders with which that country abounds. The canyon is a gorge 217 miles long, or with the addition of Marble Canyon, connected with it, 286 miles. It is from nine to thirteen miles wide and 6,300 feet below the level of the plateau. This depth is maintained for about fifty miles and surpasses that of any other canyon in the world.

Great Britain, or The British Empire. Britain, or rather Britannia, was the name which was given by the Romans to modern England and Scotland. The name Great Britain was applied to England and Scotland after James I. ascended the English throne in 1603. These with Ireland, the Isle of Man, and the Channel Islands, constitute the British Isles, or the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; and if the colonial and other foreign possessions be added, they form the British Empire. Of this empire it may safely be said that it is the greatest the world has ever known. It covers an area five times the size of the Persian Empire under Darius, and four times that of the Roman Empire under Augustus.

Great Britain proper is bounded on the north by the Atlantic, on the east by the North Sea, on the south by the English Channel, and on the west by the Atlantic, the Irish Sea, and St. George's Channel. The most northerly point is Dunnet Head in Caithness; the most southerly Lizard Point in Cornwall; the most easterly, Lowestoft Ness in Suffolk; and the most westerly, Ardnarmurchan Point in Argyshire. Its greatest length is about 608 miles, and its greatest width — from Land's End to the east coast of Kent — about 320 miles; while its surface contains 88,094 square miles. As the rocks of Great Britain form the typical series of the earth's strata, the geology of that country becomes of great importance as a key to the universal composition of the crust of the globe. The whole of the recognized series occur in Great Britain, one or two only being developed more fully elsewhere. All the physical features of the country are intimately connected with its geological structure. The older Paleozoic rocks produce mountainous regions intersected with deep and narrow valleys. The newer strata seldom rise to a great height. The highlands are rounded undulations of the strata, except where igneous rocks are intruded; and the valleys are broad and shallow. In Scotland there are consequently two extensive mountainous districts occupied chiefly with rocks of Silurian age, and intervening valleys filled up with Old Red Sandstone and Carboniferous measures. The climate of Great Britain derives its peculiar character from the insular situation of the country, taken in connection with the prevailing direction of the winds. It is mild and equable in a remarkable degree, the winters being considerably warmer and the summers cooler than at places within the same parallels of latitude. It appears from data furnished by the English meteorological societies that the mean temperature of England is 49.5°, and of Scotland 47.5°. The annual rain-fall in those districts where hills do not interfere is in England about twenty-five inches, and similar parts of Scotland about twenty-eight. Very few species of plants or animals are peculiar to Great Britain, its natural history corresponding generally with that of continental Europe. The flora of the greater part of the island resembles that of Germany.

Greece is a maritime kingdom in the south-east of Europe. It consists of three portions — the mainland, the Archipelago, and the Ionian Islands; the mainland being almost separated into two parts by the gulfs of Patras and Lepanto on the west and the Gulf of Ægina on the east, but united by the Isthmus of Corinth. The surface of the country is nearly all mountainous, and its shores are bold and rocky. Although only about one-half of the country is capable of cultivation, the soil of the rest is naturally fertile, and vegetation is singularly rich and varied, though agriculture is in a backward state. The olive is cultivated everywhere; the currant-grape is found on the west coast and in the Ionian Islands; and the mulberry, the vine, the orange, the lemon, etc., with cotton and tobacco, are also cultivated. Currants, olive oil, and lead, are the principal exports, the larger portion of which go to Great Britain. In 1881, Greece acquired from Turkey a large portion of Albania, so that it now has an area of about 25,000 square miles. Its total population in 1900 was 2,434,000.

Gulf Stream, a well-defined current in the Atlantic Ocean. It is due to the reflux of the equatorial current. The condensation and superheating of the last-named current takes place mainly in the Caribbean Sea and the Gulf of Mexico, whence arises the name Gulf Stream. Its temperature there is about 50°. It emerges as a defined hot current through the Straits of Florida, and courses in a northeast direction at a little distance from the coast of the United States, so affecting the Bermudas as to make their climate semi-tropical. Between these islands and Halifax the Gulf Stream is about sixty miles broad, 100 fathoms deep, and moves at the rate of three knots an hour. It is of a deep blue color, in marked contrast to the dull green of the Arctic reflux. The Gulf Stream moves in a northeast direction toward Europe. It is generally believed to be through its influence that the west coast of the European continent is so much milder than the corresponding latitudes of America.

Hague, The (hāg). (French La Haye; Dutch Gravenhaag, "the count's mead.") The capital city of the Kingdom of the Netherlands, province South Holland, ten miles southwest of Leyden. It is a finely-built and commodious place, after the characteristic Dutch fashion, and contains the royal palace, and numerous fine public edifices. It is the seat of government and of the Supreme Court of Justice of the Netherlands. Iron-founding and copper and lead-smelting are among the principal industries of the city. It was the birthplace of William III. of England, and Charles II. embarked from this port prior to the Restoration. Population, 242,054.

Halifax, the capital of Nova Scotia, Dominion of Canada, and the principal naval station of the dominion, is situated on the south-east coast of the peninsula, on a declivity overlooking the harbor, which is one of the finest in the world. Its pure air and beautiful surrounding scenery have brought it into high repute as a watering-place; but it has also a thriving trade; and its exports, especially of dried fish, timber, cattle, and whale and seal oil, are very considerable. The city is the seat of an Anglican bishopric and of a Roman Catholic archbishopric. It was founded by Governor Cornwallis in 1749. Population, 40,832.

Hamburg, one of the free cities of Germany, a member of the German Empire, is the greatest commercial port on the continent of Europe. It is situated about eighty miles from the North Sea, on the north branch of the Elbe. The town of Altona adjoins it on the west. From the Elbe proceed canals which intersect the east and lower part of the city in all directions, and it is also intersected by the Alster, which here forms two streams, the Binnenalster and Aussenalster. The quays and harbor accommodation are very extensive. After the destructive fire of 1842 whole streets were rebuilt in a magnificent and expensive style. Hamburg is of most importance on account of its great shipping trade and the business of banking, exchange, marine assurance, etc., carried on in connection with it. Its manufactures, including shipbuilding, tobacco and cigar making, iron-founding, brewing, etc., though large are less important. The city owes its foundation to the Emperor Charlemagne. Population, 802,793.

Havana, or, in English, "The Harbor," by far the most important city in the West Indies, is the capital of Cuba, and stands on the west side of the entrance to a magnificent harbor capable of holding 1,000 vessels. This entrance is defended by the Moro and Punta castles. The principal buildings, which are built entirely of stone, are the cathedral, the government house, the admiralty, general post-office, the royal tobacco factory, etc., and a university and law school. There are also theaters, daily newspapers, a fine dockyard, a botanic garden, and some fine promenades. The principal manufacture is cigars, which have a world-wide reputation. The trade is chiefly with Spain, the United States, and Great Britain. Population, 275,000.

Hell Gate, New York, is a narrow channel of the East River, about seven miles north-north-east of New York City, being the nearest passage into the Sound. Its navigation was formerly dangerous on account of the eddies produced under certain conditions of the tides — whence its old Dutch name of Horll-gatt, or "whirlpool pass," whereof the present term is a corruption. The rocks facing its entrance into the East River were removed by submarine blasting in 1876 and 1885.

Himalayas, The (hīm-ah-lā'yāz), or Himalaya Mountains. The loftiest chain of mountains in the world, lying between the Indian peninsula and the Thibetan table-land in South Central Asia. Its length is estimated at 1,900 miles; its mean breadth at ninety miles; and its surface covers an area of 160,000 square miles, or thereabouts. Its chief summits are those of Mount Everest, 29,002 feet (the highest point of land known); Kanchanjanga, 28,156; and Dhawalaghiri, 25,500 feet. On the southern slope, vegetation exists at an altitude of 13,000 feet above the sea, and the highest human habitation is found at 9,000 feet; on the northern, vegetation is met with at 17,500 feet; and villages at 13,000 feet. It is rich in minerals, and possesses its own distinctive flora and fauna.

Hong-Kong, or Hiang Kiang (The Fragrant or Flowing Streams), a small island off the southeast coast of China, in the province of Quang-Tong, now belonging to the British. It is situated at the mouth of the estuary that leads to Canton, from which it is distant south-east seventy-five miles. It is about ten miles in length and seven and one-half miles in breadth, and is separated from the mainland by a strait. On the north side of the island, and situated on a magnificent bay is the thriving town of Victoria, where the great bulk of the population is centered. The town stretches for about four miles along the shore and also ascends the hillside and the faces of the ravines above. It is generally well-built, with wide streets and handsome terraces, and there is a massive sea wall along the sea front. Hong-Kong is a free port, and there are no returns of its total trade, the chief articles of which consist of cottons and opium as imports, tea and silk as exports. The foreign commerce is chiefly carried on with the United States, Singapore, Japan, Great Britain, Australia, and Germany. Population, 283,905.

Honolulu, a city and capital of Hawaii, on the island of Oahu, on Oahu Bay. It is the most important city in the Pacific islands and is an important entrepôt for vessels, between the United States and Asiatic countries. The city is situated amid beautiful tropical surroundings and has an equable and healthful climate. Among the chief points of interest are the palace, the government buildings, Roman Catholic cathedral, post-office, and the Bishop Museum. There are numerous churches, public schools, public library, theater, daily and weekly newspapers, telephone and telegraph, banks, electric lights and street railways, and many commercial establishments. Population, 39,306.

Hoosac Mountain, a part of the Green Mountain range in western Massachusetts, through which is pierced the most notable railway tunnel in America. The Hoosac tunnel, which has a length of nearly five miles, was commenced in 1851, for the line between Boston and Albany, was twice abandoned, and was finally opened in 1875, having cost the State of Massachusetts about $18,000,000.

Hudson River, or North River. A river of New York, which rises in the hills to the west of Lake Champlain, and after a southerly course of upwards of 300 miles, falls into the Atlantic Ocean below the city of New York. It is navigable as far as Troy, 166 miles above New York, and is connected by canals with Lakes Champlain and Erie.

Hungary, Kingdom of (Magyar, Ország; German, Ungarn). A large country of Central Europe, formerly having an independent autonomy, but now forming the major portion of the Austrian Empire. It consists for the most part of a large and fertile, and generally well-wooded plain, watered by the Danube and its numerous affluents. To the north and east this plain is bounded by the Carpathian Mountains, while on the west it impinges upon the provinces of Moravia, Styria, and Lower Austria. To the south, the course of the Danube, and its tributary the Save, mark the line of the Turkish frontier. It is rich in mines of the precious metals, iron, copper, and coal. It, besides, has large agricultural wealth, cereals, hemp, tobacco, etc. Its wines, especially that of Tokay, are of excellent quality. The chief manufactures are cotton, woolen, coarse linen fabrics, glass and earthenware. Chief towns: Buda-Pesth (the twin capital), Maria Theresienstadt, Temesvar, Szegedin, Grosswardein, Debreczin, Presburg, Komorn, Gran, and Arad. The inhabitants consist of seven distinct races, viz: the Magyars (Hungarians proper), Slovaks, Croats, Rusniaks, Jews, Germans, and Wallachs. The Roman Catholic is the chief form of religion.

Huron. One of the five great lakes of North America, about 800 miles in circuit, bounded west and southwest by the State of Michigan; on other sides by Upper Canada. Its surface is 581 feet above the level of the sea; its depth is about 700 feet. Its waters are remarkable for their clearness and purity. This vast body of water is said to contain 3,000 islands, one of them, the Great Manitoulin, or Sacred Island, running parallel to almost the whole of the northern coast, which is one continuous mass of comparatively barren rocks.

India, or Hindustan. The greatest of the three great peninsulas which constitute the south of Asia is bounded on the north by the Himalaya Mountains, on the east by Burmah and the Bay of Bengal, and on the west by the Sulieman and Hala Mountains and the Arabian Sea. The surface of the peninsula is highly diversified, but consists mainly of three parts — namely, first, the table-land of the Deccan, in the south, between the Vindhya Hills and Cape Comorin, and flanked on either side by the Eastern and the Western Ghauts; second, a vast lowland plain in the center, embracing the entire basin of the Ganges and the lower basins of the Indus and the Brahmaputra; third, a lofty plateau, in the north, forming the southern margin of eastern high Asia, and traversed by the Himalaya Mountains, the loftiest mountains on the earth's surface. In the central and southern regions the heat is very great, but the elevated regions in the north enjoy a temperate climate: The year is divided into three seasons — the hot, the rainy, and the temperate. The hot season commences in March, the rainy in June, and the temperate in October. As almost the whole of India lies within the tropics, the vegetation, wherever there is a sufficient amount of moisture, is abundant and luxuriant. Rice and grain are grown in immense quantities; all the fruits of the tropics are found in the utmost perfection; pepper, spices, and almost every kind of garden vegetable, are produced; and the forests are of vast extent, producing immense quantities of valuable timber. On the other hand, there are large and extensive tracts of sandy desert, many parts of the surface are jungle, and the Himalayas are the abode of snow. Many parts of India are still infested with wild animals. The principal cities are: Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, Lucknow, Delhi, Lahore, and Cawnpore.

Indian Ocean, one of the five grand divisions of the universal ocean, is bounded on the south by a line drawn from the Cape of Good Hope to the most southern extremity of Tasmania or Van Dieman's Land. Its other limits, reckoned from the last-mentioned point, are Van Dieman's Land, Australia, the Indian Archipelago, Farther India, Hindustan, Persia, Arabia, and Africa. Gradually narrowing from south to north, the Indian Ocean forks at Cape Comorin into the Bay of Bengal on the east and the Arabian Sea on the west, the latter again branching off into two arms, the Persian Gulf and the Red Sea, which reach respectively the mouth of the Euphrates and the neighborhood of the Mediterranean. These details exclude the waters of the Indian Archipelago, as belonging rather to the Pacific Ocean. It contains thousands of islands or rather tens of thousands. Of these, Madagascar is the largest, and, at about the same distance from it to the east as the continent of Africa is to the west, lie Bourbon or Reunion toward the south, and Mauritius toward the north. Next in size to Madagascar, and, in fact, the only other island of any considerable magnitude, is Ceylon.

Indianapolis, capital of the State of Indiana, is the geographical center of the State, and on the edge of a great natural gas region. The most prominent public building is the State House, completed in 1887, occupying two squares, and costing $2,000,000. The courthouse, erected in 1876 at a cost of $1,200,000, is another imposing structure. The principal manufactures include steam engines, machinery, foundry supplies, and products, steel, glass, flour, tin plate, tile, bicycles, chain, paper, and pumps. There are eight grain elevators with a capacity of 1,000,000 bushels. The stockyard interests are important, and the city ranks high as a railroad and distributing center. Population, 212,198.

Ireland, a large island to the west of Great Britain, and forming with it the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. It is separated from Great Britain by St. George's Channel, the Irish Sea, and the North Channel, the last being only about fourteen miles broad at its narrowest part, which is between the north coast of the county of Antrim, in Ireland, and the Mull of Cantire, in Scotland. The extreme length of the island, from Fair Head, in Antrim, to Mizen Head, in Cork, is about 300 miles; and its greatest breadth, from Howth Head, near Dublin, to Slyne Head, in Galway, is about 180 miles. The country is for the most part flat, but it has mountains of considerable elevation in the north, west, and south. A great portion of the central plain is covered with bog-land, which occupies no less than two-fifths of the whole surface of Ireland; but much of the remaining soil is fertile, and the humidity of the climate, and the equability of the temperature — much greater than those of England — have given to the island its verdant appearance, which has earned for it the name of the "Emerald Island." Agriculture is, however, in a backward condition; and, in consequence of the absence of coal, there are few manufactures, except that of linen, which is carried on chiefly in the districts of Belfast, Armagh, and Drogheda.

Italy (Italian, Italia), a kingdom of Southern Europe, embracing the entire peninsula, boot-like in shape, extending between the Adriatic Sea on the east and the Ligurian and Tyrrhenian Seas on the west, together with the rich and considerable region which is bounded north by Switzerland and the Tyrol, east by Carniola and the Austrian Littorale, and west by France. Length, northwest to southeast (or from Mont Blanc to Cape Portio di Palo, Sicily), 780 miles; average width, 100 miles. This kingdom has a coast line of about 3,350 miles, one-third of which is insulated, the principal indentations of the sea being the gulfs of Venice, Manfredonia, Taranto, Squillace, Policastro, Gaëta, Spezzia, and Genoa; besides those of Asinora and Cagliari, in the island of Sardinia, and Castellamare in that of Sicily. The latter island is divided from the continent by the Strait of Messina. Besides the islands just named, there are those of the Lipari group, Elba, Monte Cristo, Stromboli, Ischia, Capri, Giglia, and the cluster upon which stands the city of Venice. Throughout its entire length, or rather from the Gulf of Genoa to the extremity of Calabria, Italy is intersected by the chain of the Apennines. Its western and northern frontiers are guarded by the Alps, ramifications of which mountain system extend over a great part of Piedmont, Lombardy, and Venetia; Sicily is also generally mountainous in regard to surface, Mount Etna forming the culminating point of altitude. The plains of Italy are extensive, and proverbial for their fertility and productiveness; notably so that of Lombardy, which has been termed the "Garden of Italy." The Tuscan Maremma, the Pontine Marshes, and a large portion of the Roman Campagna, are also level tracts, highly prolific and generally well cultivated. The principal rivers are the Po, with its numerous feeders; the Adige, Brenta, Piave, Tiber, Arno, Tagliamento, and Volturno; the lakes comprise those of Como, Maggiore, Garda, Bolseno, and Bracciano; salt lagoons, too, fringe the coasts of Venetia and Tuscany. A great part of the lower peninsula is almost exclusively of volcanic formation, Mount Vesuvius, for example, manifesting periodical instances of subterranean activity. Iron is largely found in Elba, borax in Tuscany, and fine varieties of marble, with salt, nitre, alum, alabaster, gypsum, etc., in other parts. Mineral and thermal springs are almost innumerable. In point of climate, Italy may be said to possess four distinct zones — ranging from the almost arctic cold of her mountain belts to an almost tropical degree of heat in the southern lowlands and valleys. On the whole, it is a healthful country. The staple products of the soil are: wines, fruits, olive oil, silk, and cotton; which, with fish, marble, sulphur, and various manufactures, constitute the bulk of its exports abroad. The principal articles fabricated in the industrial centers are textile fabrics, lace, straw hats, leather goods, glass, pottery, perfumes, chemicals, and paper. The chief cities are Naples, Rome, Milan, Genoa, Turin, Florence, Palermo, etc.

Japan, an ancient empire of Eastern Asia, to the northeast of the Chinese Empire, consists of four principal islands, and of a large number of smaller ones; the four principal islands being Nippon, or Nipon (the country of the rising sun), which is the name given by the Japanese to the whole empire; Kiushiu (the nine provinces); Shikoku (the four provinces); and Yezo. The largest island, Nippon, or Hondo, is upward of 700 miles long northeast and southwest, breadth varying from fifty to 100 miles. The coasts of the larger islands are extremely irregular, being deeply indented with gulfs, bays, and inlets, which form magnificent harbors. The surface also is generally uneven, and in many instances rises into mountains of great elevation. Volcanic vents are numerous, and earthquakes, often causing great devastation, are of frequent occurrence, and it is calculated that every seven years a Japanese city is destroyed by their agency. In Yezo some dreadful eruptions have occurred. The metallic wealth of the empire is known to be very great, comprising gold, silver, copper, tin, lead, and iron. The island of Sado is particularly rich in gold. Both the tin and copper of Japan are considered to be of very superior quality. Coal is found in various parts, and the output is rapidly increasing. Petroleum is becoming a product of some consequence. Sulphur abounds; thermal and mineral springs are of frequent occurrence; and ambergris is met with on some of the shores. Streams are numerous in Japan, but have very short courses and are for the most part rather torrents than rivers. The climate of Japan, though extremely varied — being intensely cold in the north, and about as warm as the South of France in the south — is on the whole much milder than its latitude would indicate; owing chiefly to the influence of the surrounding ocean. Vegetation of the Japanese Islands is exceedingly varied, the products of the tropics being intermingled with those of the temperate and frigid zones. The palm, banana, bamboo, bignonia, and myrtle flourish in the south, while in the north, more especially in the island of Yezo, oaks and pines abound. Sweet oranges, pomegranates, pears, apricots, peaches, and over 500 of the principal ornamental and useful plants are of foreign origin, having probably been introduced from Corea and China. The camphor and varnish trees are indigenous. The kadsı, or paper tree, a species of mulberry, grows naturally in the fields, and furnishes textile fibers from which paper is produced; paper is also made from various other plants. The chrysanthemum is a common and favorite plant and has become an emblem of Japan. The flora as a whole resembles that of a great part of North America. The soil of Japan is naturally indifferent; but the patient industry of the agriculturists favored by the genial climate has covered with vegetation every spot capable of bearing anything. In the south the sugar cane is cultivated with success; and rice yields two harvests and constitutes the chief article of food. Wheat and barley, maize and millet are grown to an important extent, and buckwheat, potatoes, melons pumpkins, and cucumbers in great abundance.

Ginger, pepper, cotton, hemp, and tobacco are cultivated in considerable quantities; and there are extensive plantations of the tea plant — yielding, however, a produce inferior to that of China. Silk is also a Japanese product. The principal cities are Tokio, Osaka, Kioto, Yokohama, Nagoya, Kobe, and Nagasaki.

Jerusalem (Greek, Hierosolyma), a famous city of Western Asia, and anciently the capital of Judea, even as it was later of Christendom. It is situated in the modern district of El Kuds, Syria, thirty-seven miles east of the Mediterranean, twenty-four west of the River Jordan, and 126 southeast of Damascus, and stands at an elevation of some 2,500 feet above sea level. Its most imposing modern structures are the mosque of the Sultan Omar, occupying the site of the Holy Temple of the Jews; and the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, containing the tombs of Godfrey of Bouillon, and of Baldwin, King of Jerusalem. Generally speaking, the aspect of the modern city is mean, poor, and dirty, and merits little notice.

Latitude. The latitude of a place on the surface of the earth is its distance north or south from the equator, and is equal to the angle which a plumb line at that place makes with the plane of the earth's equator, or to the angle which the horizon plane of the place makes with the earth's axis. Hence it may be measured by measuring the altitude of the pole of the heavens above the horizon, or by measuring the distance on the meridian of the equator from the zenith. The latitude of a heavenly body is its distance from the ecliptic, and is measured by the arc of a great circle perpendicular to the latter, intercepted between the ecliptic and the body.

Lawrence, St., one of the largest rivers in the world, which rises under the name of the St. Louis, and drains the great chain of North American lakes. In different parts of its course it is known by different names. From the sea to Lake Ontario it is called St. Lawrence; between Lakes Ontario and Erie it is called Niagara River; between Lakes Erie and St. Clair, Detroit River; between Lakes St. Clair and Huron, St. Clair River; between Lakes Huron and Superior, St. Mary's River or the Narrows, forming thus an uninterrupted waterway of upwards of 1,030 miles. It receives the Ottawa, its principal auxiliary, at Montreal, as also the St. Maurice, the Saguenay, and numerous other large rivers from the north. The river is navigable for Atlantic steamers to the city of Montreal, 600 miles up, and from Mon-trear upwards by river and lake steamers. The rapids between Montreal and Lake Ontario are passed by means of canals, and Niagara Falls by the Welland Canal. The river's breadth between Montreal and Quebec is from one-half mile to four miles; the average breadth, about two miles. Below Quebec it gradually widens till it enters the Gulf of St. Lawrence. From the beginning of December to the middle of April the navigation is totally suspended by ice. In part of its course it forms the boundary between the United States and Canada.

Liberty Enlightening the World.

This colossal statue, on Liberty Island, New York harbor, was presented by the French nation to the people of the United States in commemoration of the centennial of their national independence. It was designed by and constructed under the supervision of the artist, Bartholdi, and the height of the statue proper from base to top of torch, is 151 feet. The height of the pedestal is ninety-five feet, and the total height of the whole work above the waters of the bay is 305 feet, eleven inches, the tallest statue in the world. The pedestal was built by popular subscription throughout the United States, but the statue was the free gift of the French people. In June, 1885, the colossal figure, taken apart and securely packed in boxes, arrived at New York on the transport Isère, and was accorded a fitting public reception. The work of placing the figure on its base was completed in 1886, and on October 28th the statue was unveiled, amid imposing ceremonies, by President Cleveland in the presence of the artist Bartholdi and other guests. The statue weighs 450,000 pounds, or 225 tons. The bronze alone weighs 200,000 pounds. Forty persons can stand comfortably in the head, and the torch will hold twelve people. The number of steps in the statue, from the pedestal to the head, is 154, and the ladder leading up through the extended right arm to the torch has fifty-four rounds.

Lisbon (Portuguese, Lisboa), the capital of Portugal, in the province of Estramadura, on the right bank of the Tagus, about eighteen miles from the mouth of that river. It stretches for about five miles along the river side, and is built on several hills rising to a considerable elevation. The new royal palace, which was completed in 1864, is a magnificent edifice. Opposite the city the river is about six miles wide, and its harbor, or roadstead, is one of the finest in the world. Lisbon owes its beauty as a modern city to the great earthquake of November 1, 1755, when it is said that 50,000 lives were lost, and when a great part of the old city was destroyed. Since then, the whole of the modern city, or new town, has grown up. It is the seat of the Patriarch, who is the head of the Roman Catholic Church in Portugal; and it has many museums, libraries, and other educational institutions. The export trade of Lisbon consists chiefly of wine, oil, fruits, and salt; and it has numerous and important manufactures. Population, 356,009.

Liverpool is an important fortified seaport, borough, and commercial emporium of England, on the estuary of the Mersey. This city is the chief port of the trade between the United States and England, and possesses shipping interests on a gigantic scale. The famous docks here, nine miles in length, and unsurpassed with regard to massiveness of construction and extent of accommodation, were constructed at a cost of $65,000,000. Population, 702,047.

London, on the Thames, fifty miles from the sea, the capital of the British Empire, is the most populous and wealthiest city in the world. The city of London proper occupies one square mile in the center, is wholly a commercial port, and is governed by an annually elected mayor and aldermen; is the seat of a bishopric, with St. Paul's for cathedral. The city of Westminster is also a bishopric under a high steward and high bailiff, chosen by the dean and chapter. These two cities, with twenty-five boroughs under local officers, constitute the metropolis, and since 1888 the county of the city of London, and send fifty-nine members to parliament. Streets in the older parts are narrow, but newer districts are well built; the level ground and density of building detracts from the effect of innumerable magnificent edifices. Buckingham, Kensington, and St. James's are royal residences; the houses of parliament are the biggest Gothic building in the world; St. Paul's, built by Sir Christopher Wren, contains the remains of Nelson and Wellington, Reynolds, Turner, and Wren himself. Westminster, consecrated 1269, is the burial place of England's greatest poets and statesmen, and of many kings; the royal courts of justice in the Strand were opened in 1882. There are many educational institutions, medical hospitals, and charitable institutions of all kinds. London is the center of the English literary and artistic world, and of scientific interest and research; here are the largest publishing houses, the chief libraries and art galleries, and museums; the British Museum and library, the national galleries, etc., and magnificent botanical and zoölogical gardens. London is also a grand emporium of commerce, and the banking center of the world. It has nine principal docks; its shipping trade is unrivaled, 55,000 vessels enter and clear annually; it pays more than half the custom duties of the kingdom, and handles more than a quarter of the total exports; its warehouse trade is second only to that of Manchester; it manufactures almost everything, chiefly watches, jewelry, leather goods, cycles, pianos, and glass. The control of traffic, the lighting, and water-supply of so large a city are causing yearly more serious problems. Pop., 4,536,541.

Los Angeles, on Los Angeles River, 480 miles southeast of San Francisco, is the commercial center for Southern California. It is in a region containing gold, silver, and lead mines, and petroleum wells, and yielding the principal grains, wines, and citrus and deciduous fruits. Its fine climate has attracted many people of wealth and culture to its environs, and has stimulated its marvelous growth as well. Population (estimated 1908), 275,000.

Lyons, third city of France in population, is situated chiefly on the peninsula between the Rivers Rhone and Saone, 245 miles southeast of Paris. It is the great warehouse of the south of France and of Switzerland; principal manufacture, silk stuffs, giving employment directly or indirectly to 100,000 hands. The cathedral and Church of St. Nizier, the Hotel de Ville (town hall), the finest edifice of the kind in the country, the hospital, the public library, and the Palais des Beaux Arts, are the most notable among numerous institutions. There are also a university-academy, an imperial veterinary school — the first founded in the country, and still the best — schools for agriculture, medicine, etc. The two rivers are crossed by nineteen bridges; twelve over the Saone, and seven over the Rhone. The quays, twenty-eight in number, are said to be the most remarkable in Europe. There are several large and important suburbs; several fine squares, of which the Place Bellecour is one of the largest in Europe. Population, 459,099.

Madrid, the capital of Spain and of the province of Madrid, a part of New Castile, situated near the heart of the country, on the left bank of the Manzanares, a sub-affluent of the Tagus, and on a hilly, sandy plateau, 2,200 feet above the sea. One of the handsomest of European cities, it has a very modern aspect, and is partly surrounded by a brick wall twenty feet high, and pierced by sixteen gates, the most notable being the Puerta de Alcala, a triumphal arch seventy-two feet high at the foot of the Calle de Alcala, a magnificent street that traverses the city from northeast to southwest. The city is girt with fine promenades and stately suburban villas embowered in beautiful gardens.

The great building in Madrid is the Real Palacio, on the west side, between the city and the river. It is a square, 470 feet on each side, and 100 feet high, built (1737–1750) of granite and white marble, inclosing a court 240 feet square, and containing a library of 100,000 volumes, an armory of 2,533 specimens, and a numismatic collection of 150,000 pieces. Madrid has also about sixty churches, forty-four monasteries, used since 1836 for secular purposes, twenty-four nunneries, twenty-four hospitals (one with 1,526 beds), fourteen barracks, 100 elementary schools, several colleges or higher schools, a university, a medical school, a conservatory of music, eight theaters, four public libraries, eight museums, a botanical garden, an observatory, an academy modeled on that of Paris, etc. The royal museum in the Prado contains a gallery of 1,833 pictures, one of the richest collections in the world.

The industries of Madrid are slight. The commerce, however, is important, as Madrid is the entrepot for all the interior provinces. Population, 589,929.

Maggiore (Lake) (măd-jo'ra), or Locarna, a considerable expanse of water in Northern Italy, lying partly within the latter, and partly included in the Swiss canton of Ticino. Length, thirty-nine miles, breadth from one-half mile to five and one-half miles; 646 feet above sea-level, with a maximum depth of 1,158 feet. It receives the rivers Tresa and Ticino, and its surface is dotted with several islands, chief among them being the Borromean group — one of which, "Isola Bella," is renowned for its exquisite beauty of location and surroundings.

Malays, a people inhabiting the Malay Peninsula and the Eastern or Malay Archipelago, or collectively Malaysia. They are of Mongolian affinity. This enterprising race has made its way widely over the Pacific islands, reaching as far south as Madagascar, where they exist as the dominant Hova element of the population. This widespread dominion is due to their bold, enterprising, and roving disposition, their place of residence on the peninsula and the larger islands being the coast region, whence they have driven the natives into the interior and where they long pursued a piratical career, darting from hidden streams in their well-manned proas on any vessel that approached too near the coast, or more boldly lying in wait in fleets in the open sea, for any expected rich prize. Physically considered, the Malays are of low stature. In various respects they bear a close resemblance to the Mongolians of Eastern Asia, but differ from them radically in language. Of late years the lessons taught them by European naval vessels have forced the Malays to desist from piracy. Intellectually they seem at a low level, and have never developed a native literature, such civilization as they possess being due to Arab and Hindu influence.

Mammoth Cave, a cavern near Green River, Edmonson County, Kentucky, about 85 miles south-southwest of Louisville. The cave is about 10 miles long, but it requires upward of 150 miles of traveling to explore its multitudinous avenues, chambers, grottoes, rivers, and cataracts. The main cave is 4 miles long, from 40 to 300 feet wide, and rises in height to 125 feet. The most interesting features of the cave are: The Chief City or Temple, covering an area of about four acres and having a dome of solid rock 120 feet high; the Star Chamber, about 500 feet long by 70 feet wide, with a ceiling 70 feet high, consisting of black gypsum dotted with many white points, which when the chamber is lighted, have all the appearance of stars; Silliman's avenue, $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles long, 20 to 200 feet wide, and 20 to 40 feet high; Cleveland's Cabinet, an arch 50 feet wide, 10 feet high and 2 miles long, covered with a variety of formations; the Maelstrom Abyss and Bottomless Pit, each of which is 20 feet wide and about 175 feet deep; and the river Styx, 450 feet long, and crossed by a natural bridge about 30 feet high. The cave contains various kinds of animals, and there are also found lizards, crickets, frogs, bats, and different sorts of fish. The latter include the famous eyeless fish, which are white in color. The atmosphere is pure and healthful and there is a temperature throughout the year of about 59°.

Manchester, a city in Lancaster County, England, on the Irwell, an affluent of the Mersey, thirty-one miles east of Liverpool. It is the center of the cotton trade of Great Britain, and one of the principal manufacturing cities in the world. The manufacture of silk goods, which was introduced in 1816, has generally flourished since 1826, producing every description of fabrics from the rich brocade to the flimsy Persian. In some cotton factories the process of spinning only is carried on; in many of them upward of 600 power looms are in action, each producing from fifteen to twenty pieces of fabric, of twenty-four yards each per week. There are over 60,000 persons employed in the cotton mills, besides 7,000 skilled mechanics engaged in the production of steam engines, looms, and other machinery. The climate of Manchester is very healthy, despite the disadvantage of the prevalence of smoke arising from the number of factories, etc. Population, 543,969.

Manchuria (Chinese, Shing-King), a Chinese territory occupying the northeast corner of the empire; it is divided into three provinces, Shing-King, Feng-Tien, or Leaotong in the south (of which Mukden is the capital), Kirin in the center (with a capital of the same name), and He-Lung-Kiang in the north (with capital Tsitsihar); total area, 362,310 square miles; population (1900), estimated 7,500,000. The country is mountainous, but on the whole fertile. The climate is good; though the winters are severe, they are healthy and bracing. The vast forests of the north are rich in useful timber of all kinds. The administration is military, the governors of the two northern provinces being subordinate to the governor of Mukden. The Manchus are a hardy race, and their country has long been the great recruiting ground for the Chinese army; but of late years vast numbers of Chinese proper have flocked into it, so that now they by far outnumber the native race. In the Seventeenth Century the Manchus invaded China and placed their leader's son on the throne. Since that time the Manchu Dynasty has continued to reign in China, and the Manchu language has become the court and official language.

For a considerable time prior to 1891, when the first sod was turned for the construction of the great Siberian railroad, the Russian Government was anxious to secure control of this territory. On November 9, 1901, the Russian minister of finance, in announcing the completion of this railroad from Transbaikal territory to Vladivostok and Port Arthur, used the phrase "Our enterprise in Manchuria is practically, though not entirely, concluded." A number of times it was declared that the Chinese Government, under pressure from Li Hung Chang, had signed a secret treaty with Russia for the cession of this territory. In 1900, while the allied army was hastening to the relief of the legations in Peking a Russian military force occupied the right bank of the Amur River, and declared it to be Russian territory, and a provisional Russian administration was established. Official declarations were sent out from Petersburg to the effect that the current rumors of an incorporation of Manchuria with the Russian Empire were groundless.

In October, 1903, Russia having failed to evacuate Manchuria on the 8th of that month, as promised, Japan made military and naval preparations of a warlike character, while Russia also strengthened her forces in the distant Orient, which eventuated in the Russo-Japanese War. While, by the treaty of Portsmouth, Manchuria was restored to China, it is still a bone of contention between Russia and Japan.

Manila, or Manilla, a seaport of the island of Luzon, capital of the Philippines, situated near the mouth of the River Passig, at the head of a bay of same name. It possesses an excellent harbor, and carries on a large and important commerce with Europe, the United States, and China. The climate is healthful on the whole, but the place is subject to earthquakes, the last of which, in 1863, was the cause of serious loss of life. In Manila Bay, on May 1, 1898, Admiral Dewey with six warships, destroyed Spain's Asiatic Squadron, thirteen vessels, under Admiral Montejó. Population, 219,928.

Marseilles (mär-sälz), French Marseille (mär-say'-e), a city, principal commercial seaport of France, on the Mediterranean, and capital of the department of Bouches-du-Rhône. It lies in the form of an amphitheater round a natural harbor of moderate size, now known as the Old Harbor. Though a handsome city as a whole, Marseilles is not rich in public edifices. The harbor is strongly defended by various works. What is called the New Harbor consists of a series of extensive docks along the shore to the west, with a protecting breakwater in front.

In recent times Marseilles has made great progress in its extent, street improvements, population, and commerce, largely owing to the conquest of Algeria, and the opening of the Suez Canal. Marseilles was founded by a colony of Greeks from Asia Minor, about 600 years before Christ, the original name being Massalia. It attained great prosperity as a Greek colonial center, and the Greek language is said to have been spoken there till several centuries after Christ. It was taken by Cæsar in 49 B. C. On the decline of the Roman Empire it became a prey to the Goths, Burgundians, and Franks. In 735 it fell into the hands of the Saracens, and in the Tenth Century it came under the dominion of the counts of Provence, and for some centuries after followed the fortunes of that house. Population, 525,250.

Matterhorn, a peak of the Alps, between the Swiss canton of Valais and Piedmont, rising to the altitude of 14,705 feet. The actual peak was first scaled by Lord Francis Douglas, the Rev. C. Hudson, Hadow, and Whymper, with three guides, July 14, 1865, when the three first-named and one of the guides fell over a precipice and were killed.

Mecca, a city of Arabia, about sixty miles from the Red Sea, the chief town of the Hedjaz, and celebrated as the birthplace of Mohammed. It is the sacred city of the Mohammedans, and, in itself uninteresting, is important on account of the pilgrimages which are made annually to the Great Mosque, in which is contained the Kaaba. From 100,000 to 150,000 persons are said to take part in these pilgrimages annually. The city, like the whole province of the Hedjaz, now belongs to Turkey. Population, about 50,000.

Medina, a city of Arabia, about 230 miles north of Mecca. It is the second capital of the Hedjaz, and is celebrated as the seat of Mohammed's empire, as the place to which he fled from Mecca, and likewise as his burial-place. To the Mohammedans Medina is only less sacred than Mecca, but it is a much smaller city, and is now chiefly important as one of the stations on the pilgrim-route to Mecca. The city, like the whole province of the Hedjaz, belongs to Turkey. Stationary population, about 40,000.

Mediterranean Sea, The (med-e-tër-ra'ne-ăn), a great inland sea, separating the continent of Europe from that of Africa and part of Western Asia; connecting by the Strait of Gibraltar, at its western extremity, with the Atlantic Ocean, and on the northeast with the Sea of Marmora by the channel of the Dardanelles, and thence by the Bosphorus with the Euxine. Extreme length, 2,300 miles; maximum breadth, 1,200 miles. Estimated area, 690,000 square miles. Various portions of its surface take other names, as the "Ligurian," "Tyrrhenian," "Ionian," "Canadian," "Ægean," and "Adriatic" seas. Its coast-line, too, embraces the extensive gulfs of Taranto, Patras, Ægina, Salonika, Smyrna, Adalia, Iskanderoon, Gaeta, Genoa, Lyon, Cabes, and Sidra. It receives the waters of the Nile, Ebro, Rhone, Po, and many others; contains the considerable islands of Sardinia, Corsica, Sicily, the Balearic group, Malta, Candia, Cyprus, and the clusters of the Greek Archipelago; and possesses a temperature averaging from 72° to 76°, or $\frac{1}{2}$ ° Fahr. higher than that of the Atlantic Ocean. It has a tide rising from five to seven feet, and a constant upper current sets in from the Atlantic, through the Strait of Gibraltar. Its depth varies according to situation; and it is at times subject to destructive winds, such as the "sirocco" and the "white squall." The surrounding territories are the richest in the world, and the greatest movements in civilization and art have taken place around it in Africa, Phenicia, Carthage, Greece, and Rome.

Melbourne, the largest city of Australia; capital of Victoria; is situated on the Yarra Yarra River, a stream of no great size, Melbourne proper being several miles from its mouth, while suburban extensions reach the shores of Port Phillip Bay, into which the river flows. The shipping trade is large, both in exports and imports, the chief of the former being wool, of the latter manufactured goods. Most imports are subject to a heavy duty.

By its railway system the city is connected with all the principal towns of the Australian continent. The first settlements on the site of Melbourne were made in 1835, and a year or two after it received its present name, being so called after Lord Melbourne, who was then British prime minister. It was incorporated in 1842. In 1851 it became the capital of Victoria (then established as a separate colony), and received an immense impetus from the discovery of gold fields. A centennial exhibition was held in 1888 in celebration of the founding (in 1788) of the Australian colonies. The first Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia was opened in the Exhibition Building on May 9, 1901, by the Prince of Wales. Population, 502,610.

Melrose, a village of Scotland, county of Roxburgh; on the Tweed, thirty-one miles southeast of Edinburgh. It is celebrated for possessing the finest monastic ruin in Scotland. Melrose Abbey, originally founded by David I., in 1136, was destroyed by Edward II., of England, in 1322. In 1336 it was rebuilt by Robert Bruce, and completed in the reign of James IV., about 1488–1513. It was again destroyed by the English in 1545. It was of Gothic style, and the ruins still attest its grandeur and magnificence.

Mexico (Spanish, Mejico; Mexican, Anahuac), an extensive republic and quondam empire of North America, bounded north by the United States, east by the Gulf of Mexico and Caribbean Sea, southeast by Central America, and south and west by the Pacific Ocean. Its extreme length, northwest to southeast, may be taken at 2,000 miles; and its maximum breadth at about 800 miles. Its chief centers of trade and population are Mexico, the capital; Vera Cruz, Tampico, La Puebla, Jalapa, Matamoros, Acapulco, San Blas, Mazatlan, Durango, and Chihuahua; of which Vera Cruz and Tampico are considerable seaports. Mexico is one of the richest and most varied zones in the world, and consists of three grand natural divisions, viz: the tierras calientes, or "hot regions," along its coasts; the tierras templadas, or "temperate tracts," occupying what is called the "table-land of Anahuac," and the tierras frias, or "cold climes," found high up among the Cordilleras and the Sierra Madre, two mountain systems that intersect the republic in almost parallel lines. Connected with, or outlying from, these chains, are some of the loftiest volcanic peaks on the North American continent, the highest of which is Popocatepetl. The frontier line separating Mexico from Texas is the great Rio Grande del Norte, besides which river there are the Bravo del Norte, Colorado, Grande de Santiago, and Conchas — all streams of magnitude. The chief lakes are those of Chapula, Mexico, and Parras. The soil of Mexico is among the richest in the world, producing the finest of tropical fruits and flowers, valuable timber and dyewoods, the cereals, and important medicinal drugs and spices. The products of the Mexican mines include silver — long the great staple of export, the annual average produce being valued at $15,000,000 — iron, copper, lead, tin, quicksilver, alum, and precious stones. The foreign commerce of the country is carried on chiefly with the United States, England, and France.

Michigan, Lake, the second largest of the Great Lakes of North America. It is wholly within the United States, having the State of Michigan on the east and northwest, Wisconsin and Illinois on the west, and Indiana on the south. On the northeast it communicates with Lake Huron by the narrow Strait of Mackinaw. It is 350 miles long, and on an average sixty miles broad; area, estimated at 22,000 square miles. The lake is 581 feet above sea level; the greatest ascertained depth is about 1,000 feet.

Milan, a city of Italy, in the province of Milan, which is a part of the old province of Lombardy. It is situated on a plain, between the rivers Ticino and Adda, and is the largest city of Italy after Rome and Naples. Under the name of Mediolanum it was an important town of the Romans, and, from the time of Diocletian till its capture by Attila, it was the usual residence of the emperors of the West. The modern city is about eight miles in circumference, and is encompassed on three sides by walls and low ramparts. It has a cathedral, the "Duomo," which dates from the Fourteenth Century, and which is the finest Gothic edifice in Italy, being constructed entirely of white marble. In the Duomo, in 1805, Napoleon I. was crowned King of Italy. The city possesses many other splendid buildings, and numerous educational and other institutions. It is the center of the silk trade of Lombardy, and is the largest book-mart in Italy. In 1872 an Arts Exposition was held in the city, in 1881, a National Exposition, and in 1907, an International Exposition of Industrial Arts. Population, 541,981.

Minneapolis, a city of the United States, county seat of Hennepin County, Minnesota, on both sides of the Mississippi, at the Falls of St. Anthony, and now contiguous to St. Paul. It is regularly laid out with avenues eighty feet wide, running east and west, having double rows of trees on each side. The public buildings include the court house, the University of Minnesota (chartered in 1851), the Augsburg Theological Seminary, Lutheran (opened in 1869); a handsome Free Public Library, the building alone costing $350,000, and containing 50,000 volumes. There are numerous fine schools, churches, colleges, banks, theaters, and parks. The principal industries are the manufacture of flour, lumber, engines, boilers, agricultural implements, carriages, wagons, bicycles, machinery, foundries, and pork-packing. It leads all other centers in the manufacture of flour. It is also an important lumber and wheat mart. The city possesses a territory of about sixty square miles, and is built on a fine esplanade that commands a very fine view of the justly-celebrated Falls of Minnehaha, and several fine lakes. It is a great railroad center, being on the Burlington route; Chicago & Northwestern; Chicago Great Western; Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul; Chicago, St. Paul, Minnesota & Omaha; Great Northern; Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marié; the North Pacific; St. Paul & Duluth; and Wisconsin Central R. R's. The city and county building stands a monument of the enterprise of the city; it is a most beautiful structure and was built at a cost of $4,000,000. The Masonic Temple and other buildings add to the architectural beauties. There are six daily journals, and a large number of weekly, monthly, and other periodicals. Population, 261,974.

Mirage, a phenomenon extremely common in certain localities, and as simple in its origin as astonishing in its effects. Under it are classed the appearance of distant objects as double, or as if suspended in the air, erect or inverted, etc. One cause of mirage is a diminution of the density of the air near the surface of the earth, produced by the transmission of heat from the earth, or in some other way; the denser stratum being thus placed above, instead of, as is usually the case, below the rarer. Now, rays of light from a distant object, situated in the denser medium

(i. e., a little above the earth's level), coming in a direction nearly parallel to the earth's surface, meet the rarer medium at a very obtuse angle, and instead of passing into it, are reflected back to the dense medium; the common surface of the two media acting as a mirror. Suppose, then a spectator to be situated on an eminence, and looking at an object situated like himself in the denser stratum of air, he will see the object by means of directly transmitted rays; but besides this, rays from the object will be reflected from the upper surface of the rarer stratum of air beneath to his eye. The image produced by the reflected rays will appear inverted, and below the real object, just as an image reflected in water appears when observed from a distance. If the object is a cloud or portion of sky, it will appear by the reflected rays as lying on the surface of the earth, and bearing a strong resemblance to a sheet of water; also, as the reflecting surface is irregular, and constantly varies its position, owing to the constant communication of heat to the upper stratum, the reflected image will be constantly varying, and will present the appearance of a water surface ruffled by the wind. This form of mirage, which even experienced travelers have found to be completely deceptive, is of common occurrence in the arid deserts of Lower Egypt, Persia, Tartary, etc. In particular states of the atmosphere, reflection of a portion only of the rays takes place at the surface of the dense medium, and thus double images are formed, one by reflection, and the other by refraction — the first inverted, and the second erect. The phenomena of mirage are frequently much more strange and complicated, the images being often much distorted and magnified.

Miseno, a promontory of the province of Naples, nine miles southwest of the city of Naples. On the outskirts of the promontory are the extensive ruins of the ancient city of Misenum, including a vast church and theater. Miseno is much visited on account of its wonderful grotto Draconara, and a curious subterranean building or labyrinth, called the Hundred Chambers, supposed to have been anciently employed as dungeons.

Missolonghi, also Mesolonghi, a small town of Greece, in the government of Ætolia, on the northern shore of the Gulf of Patras, twenty-four miles west of Lepanto. It is chiefly memorable for the two sieges which it underwent during the war of independence in the early part of the present century. In 1822, it was invested by land and sea by the Turks, who, after a siege of two months, were compelled to withdraw. In 1826, it was again besieged by an overwhelming Ottoman force; and after ten months of resistance and suffering, its garrison, reduced from 5,000 to 3,000 fighting men, cut their way through the ranks of the enemy, carrying with them a great number of the women and children. The Turks then entered the town, which was all but totally destroyed. Here Lord Byron died in 1824. Population about 4,000.

Missouri, a river of the United States; formed in the Rocky Mountains, in Montana, winds circuitously along the base of the mountains, then east till it reaches the west boundary of North Dakota and receives the Yellowstone. Here it begins to flow southeast through North and South Dakota, then forms the east boundary of Nebraska, separates for a short distance Kansas from Missouri, then strikes east across the latter State, and joins the Mississippi after a course of 2,908 miles. It is navigable 2,500 miles from the Mississippi, giving a water-route for commerce into the remote Northwestern States.

Mitylene (the ancient Lesbos), an island in the Grecian Archipelago, one of the largest of the Sporades, about ten miles from the Asiatic coast. Its chief town, Mitylene, or Castro, is situated on the east side of the island. Lesbos was important in the early history of Greece as the native region of the Æolian school of lyric poetry. Both Alcæus and Sappho were natives of the island. It attained great importance likewise, as a naval power, and planted colonies in Mysia and Thrace. The island is mountainous and is covered with pine forests. Its area is about 600 square miles, and its population is about 40,000.

Monaco, a small principality in the south of France, within the department of Alpes Maritimes. The only town, Monaco (of which the principality now mainly consists), is situated on a lofty promontory on the shore of the Mediterranean, about nine miles northeast of Nice. It has a fine climate, being sheltered toward the north by the lofty range of the Alps; and its soil is singularly fertile, producing oranges, lemons, and other fruits in abundance. It is notorious, however, for its great gaming establishments of Monte Carlo, from which the prince derives nearly the whole of his revenue. Monaco was held by the Genoese family of the Grimaldi from about the close of the Tenth to the close of the Eighteenth Century. In 1848, the communes of Roccabruna and Mentone, which up to that time had belonged to the principality, were annexed to Sardinia, and in 1861 they were ceded to France, the prince receiving for his remaining interest in them the sum of four million francs. The area of the still existing principality is about six square miles, and its population is 13,500.

Mongols (mōng'gūlz). A division of the human race, ranking second in the classification of Blumenbach, and, viewed collectively, the one great nomadic people of the earth. They include besides the Mongols Proper, the Tartars, Chinese and Indo-Chinese, the Burmese, Siamese, Japanese, Esquimaux, Samoyedes, Finns, Lapps, Turks, and Magyars. The physical characteristics of the true Mongol is thus depicted by Dr Latham: "The face of the Mongolian is broad and flat. This is because the cheek-bones stand out laterally, and the nasal bones are depressed. The cheek-bones, we say, stand out laterally, since they are not merely projecting, for this they might be without giving much breadth to the face, inasmuch as they might stand forward. * * * The distance between the eyes is great, the eyes themselves being oblique, and their carunculæ concealed. The eyebrows form a low and imperfect arch, black and scanty. The iris is dark, the cornea yellow. The complexion is tawny, the stature low. The ears are large, standing out from the head; the lips thick and fleshy rather than thin; the teeth somewhat oblique in their insertion, the forehead low and flat, and the hair lank and thin." Under the various designations of Scythians, Huns, Tartars, Turks, the Mongols during centuries were the terror of Eastern Europe, and under Genghis Khan and Tamerlane carried their victorious arms over China, Persia, Siberia, and India. The Mongolian family is estimated to number 528,000,000, or about one-half of the human race.

Mont Blanc, the highest mountain in the Alps, generally spoken of as the highest mountain in Europe, though Elburz, in the mountains of the Caucasus, is 3,000 feet higher. It is situated in the French department of Haute Savoie, on the Italian border, and about thirty-eight miles south of the Lake of Geneva. It has an elevation above the sea of 15,780 feet. The mountain is generally ascended from the village of Chamouni. The summit was first reached by Saussure, and a guide named Balmat, August 2, 1787.

Monte Carlo, in the principality of Monaco, is beautifully situated on a sheltered bay and enjoys a delightful climate; while the surrounding scenery is full of charm and variety. The Casino is on a promontory on the east side of the town; besides a fully-supplied reading room, there is an elaborately decorated salle de fetes and widely known salles de jeu (gaming rooms). High-class music twice daily. Splendid view from terrace behind the casino. The salles de jeu are open from 11.30 A. M. until 11.30 P. M., tickets gratis obtained in the vestibule; inhabitants of principality not admitted. Trente-et-quarante and roulette are the games played, at the former the minimum stake is twenty francs, the maximum 12,000 francs; at roulette the minimum is five francs, the maximum 6,000 francs. The gardens of the casino are famous for their beauty.

Adjoining the casino terrace is the tir aux pigeons, attended by the most expert trap shots from all parts; the grand prix, competed for in January, is 20,000 francs.

Montenegro, an independent principality in Europe, in the northwest of Turkey, bounded by Herzegovina, Albania, the Adriatic, and Dalmatia. Area, about 3,630 square miles. The surface is everywhere mountainous, being covered by an extension of the Dinaric Alps, rising to the height of 8,850 feet. There are, however, a few beautiful and verdant plains and valleys, in which the soil is tolerably fertile. The principal river is the Moratcha. About half of the Lake of Scutari, besides several smaller lakes, lies within the Montenegrin boundary. The climate is healthy. Forests of beech, pine, chestnuts, and other valuable timber cover many of the mountain sides. Fruit-trees of all kinds abound, especially in the sheltered valleys, where even almonds, vines, and pomegranates ripen. Agriculture is in a very rude and inefficient state, though every cultivable piece of land is planted with Indian corn, potatoes, tobacco, rye, wheat, cabages, or some other useful plant. Sheep, cattle, and goats are reared in great numbers. Manufactures, with the exception of a coarse woolen stuff, are unknown. The chief occupations of the Montenegrins are agriculture and fishing, trade being altogether left to foreigners. The exports are sheep and cattle, mutton-hams, sumach, honey, hides, cheese, butter, and other agricultural produce. The chief towns (in reality little more than villages) are Cetinje (2,000 inhabitants), the capital; Podgoritzza (4,000 inhabitants); Niksich; and the seaports Dulcigno and Antivari. The Montenegrins are pure Serbs and speak a Serbian dialect. They are generally of tall stature and well proportioned. The men go at all times fully armed, whatever be the occupation in which they are engaged, and all between 14 and 50 years of age (estimated at 29,000) are liable to military service. In religion they are of the Greek Church. Education, once neglected, is now free and compulsory. Montenegro is nominally a constitutional monarchy, with a state council of eight members, but the prince is practically absolute. The revenue is estimated at about $300,000. The population is given as 245,380.

Montreal (mont-re-ohl'), the metropolitan city of Canada; on an island of the same name, in the province of Quebec, at the head of ocean navigation on the St. Lawrence River. The city, which is one of the most attractive in Canada, contains many handsome public buildings, and is divided into distinctly marked English and French quarters. The chief public buildings are the court-house, the barracks, Bonsecours Market, custom-house, city hall, etc.; and the principal churches are St. Peter's Cathedral, constructed on the model of St. Peter's at Rome, the church of Notre Dame (large enough to accommodate 10,000 persons), St. Patrick's, Christ Church Cathedral, St. Andrew's, St. Paul's, etc. McGill University, Presbyterian College, Wesleyan Theological College, Congregational College, Anglican Diocesan College, Bishop's College and University, the Montreal School of Medicine and Surgery, are the leading Protestant educational institutions; those of the Roman Catholics comprise Laval University, St. Mary's College, Montreal College, Hochelaga Convent, etc. There are several libraries besides those of the above institutions, a natural history society with museum, an art association, musical societies, etc. The exports are chiefly the products of the country, such as grain, flour, cheese, lumber, etc., and there is a large trade in furs. The principal imports are cottons, woolens, and silks, iron and hardware, and tea and sugar. Among the industrial establishments of Montreal are iron foundries, distilleries, breweries, sugar refineries, soap and candle works; and there are manufactures of cotton, silk, boots and shoes, paper, carpets, tobacco, hardware, edge tools, floor-cloth, carriages, etc. The Grand Trunk Railway, which connects the railways of Canada with those of the United States, crosses the St. Lawrence at Montreal by the stupendous (tubular) Victoria Bridge, 9,437 feet in length, constructed in 1854-59.

Montreal was founded by Maisonneuve, May 18, 1642, during the French régime in Canada. On September 8, 1760, Montreal capitulated to General Amherst and the surrender of the city completed the conquest of New France by the English. In 1775, Montreal was captured by the Americans, who sent expeditions under Montgomery and Arnold to capture Quebec and Montreal; and General Carleton in command of the British forces at Montreal had to retreat to Quebec, where the Americans were ultimately defeated. In 1775, the American General Wooster made his headquarters in the Chateau de Ramer-gay, which still stands opposite the city hall, and which was the official residence of the British governors after the conquest. In this same chateau, the Commissioners of Congress, Benjamin Franklin, Samuel Chase, and Charles Carroll, in 1776, met and held council under General Benedict Arnold. In 1776 the American forces retreated. Montreal obtained its first city charter in 1833, the first mayor being Jacques Viger. The recent history of the city has been an almost unbroken record of commercial and industrial progress. Great impetus was given to its growth by the opening of the Canadian Pacific Railway; the first train on which left Montreal for Vancouver on June 28, 1886. Population, 267,730.

Morocco, or Marocco, known to the natives as Maghreb-el-Aksa, "the farthest west," is an empire or sultanate which is confined to that part of Northwest Africa, bounded on the east (at the Wad Kiss) by Algeria and on the south by Cape Nun and the Wad Draa, though both here and on the Sahara side of the Atlas the limits of the empire are rather indeterminate. Area, about 219,000 square miles; population estimated at 5,000,000.

Morocco produces crops of the temperate and tropical zones. Wheat and barley are grown largely. Various gums, oranges, figs, almonds, lemons, and dates are among the other vegetable products. Cotton and hemp are grown for home consumption. Most European fruits grow well, and among other products sugar has been raised. Cattle are exported; but no animals can be sent out of the country without an imperial permit.

The inhabitants consist of six principal groups. (1) The Berbers or Kabyles, of whom the Amazigh, Shelluh, and Tuareg are only branches, are the aborigines. They inhabit for the most part the mountain regions, and are still only half subdued. (2) The Arabs are descendants of the invaders who came in the Seventh Century. (3) The Jews were very early settlers, semi-independent colonies still subsisting in the Atlas and the Sus country, though most of them in the towns are refugees driven out of Spain and Portugal. (4) A few thousands of Europeans, chiefly Spaniards, are almost entirely confined to the coast towns. (5) The "Moors," a term vaguely applied to all the Mohammedan inhabitants, are really Arabs with a large admixture of Spanish and other European bloods. (6) The Negroes, of whom there are large numbers, were brought from the Soudan as slaves.

The Sultan is one of the most perfect specimens of an absolute monarch existing. He receives and disposes of the entire revenue. All justice is bought and sold. Yet, owing to the religious fanaticism of the people, and the mutual jealousies of the European powers, whose representatives reside at Tangier, the political equilibrium is preserved. The only European nation which at present has any territory in Morocco is Spain, which maintains a fortress at Ceuta, and four convict settlements, and a fishing station at Ifni.

Much of the interior of Morocco is unknown to Europeans, but by the treaty of Algeciras, in 1907, commercial ingress and egress are now guaranteed to European nations. Fez, the capital, has a population of about 140,000, and Tangier about 35,000. Morocco City is the southern capital. The Sultan and his subjects are of the Malekite sect of Sunnite Mohammedans. The differences between sects are chiefly in the attitudes assumed during the recital of prayers.

Moscow (mös'kō) [Russian, Moskwa], the second capital of the Russian Empire. It is the chief town of the government of the same name, and is situated in a highly-cultivated district on the Moskwa River, 400 miles southeast of St. Petersburg, with which it is in direct communication by rail. The quarter known as the Kreml or Kremlin, on a height about 100 feet above the river, forms the center of the town, and contains the principal buildings. It is inclosed by a high stone wall, and contains the old palace of the czars and several other palaces; the Cathedral of the Assumption, founded in 1326, rebuilt in 1472; the Church of the Annunciation, in which the emperors are recrowned; the Cathedral of St. Michael; the Palace of Arms, an immense building occupied by the senate, the treasury and the arsenal; and the Tower of Ivan Veliki (209 feet), surmounted by a gilded dome, and having at its foot the great Czar Kolokol, or king of bells, sixty feet round the rim, nineteen feet high, and weighing upward of 192 tons, the largest in the world. Outside the Kreml the chief building is the Cathedral of St. Vassili, with no less than twenty gilded and painted domes and towers, all of different shapes and sizes. Among the principal educational establishments is the Imperial University, founded in 1755 by the Empress Catherine. It has a rich museum and a library of 200,000 volumes, and is the most important of the Russian universities. Moscow is the first manufacturing city in the empire, and of late years its industrial and commercial activity has greatly increased. The principal manufactures are textile fabrics, chiefly woolen, cotton, and silk, besides hats, hardware, leather, chemical products, beer, and spirits. From its central position, Moscow is the great entrepôt for the internal commerce of the empire. The foundation of the city dates from 1147. It became the capital of Muscovy, and afterwards of the whole Russian Empire; but was deprived of this honor in 1703, when St. Petersburg was founded. The principal event in the history of Moscow is the burning of it in 1812 for the purpose of dislodging the French from their winter quarters. Population, 1,092,360.

north latitude with the 151st meridian of west longitude. Recent measurements made by the United States Geological Survey show this to be the tallest peak in the United States, overtopping Mount St. Elias and Mount Logan by about 1,000 feet, its height being 20,464 feet. The great height of Mount McKinley has been known to the Indians and the scattering whites of that region, for many years, as its towering summit is plainly visible on clear days for a distance of 125 miles or more.

Munich (mū'-nik), the capital city of Bavaria, on an extensive plateau, about 1,700 feet above sea-level, chiefly on the left bank of the Isar. The old town has a quaint and irregular character, but the new town, which has sprung up chiefly to the north and west, has a regular and imposing appearance, and altogether Munich is one of the finest towns in Germany. The royal palace forms a very extensive series of buildings chiefly in the Italian style, and contains many magnificent apartments and rich artistic and other treasures. The royal library (occupying a fine building in the Florentine style) has upward of 1,000,000 volumes and 30,000 manuscripts, being thus one of the largest in Europe. The university had in 1899-1900, 194 professors and teachers, and 4,257 students in theology, jurisprudence, medicine, and philosophy, together with a library of over 300,000 volumes. The industries are numerous, and in some particular branches have acquired a high name. Among others may be mentioned painted glass and other artistic productions, mathematical, optical, and surgical instruments, gold and silver lace, jewelry, glass, carriages, bells, musical instruments, etc. Munich is the seat of the high courts of legislature and of law, and of all the more important offices of the state. It was founded by Henry the Lion, about 1142, was taken by Gustavus Adolphus in 1632, by the French under Moreau in 1800, and by Napoleon in 1805. Population, 545,091.

Naples (Italian, Napoli), a magnificent city of Southern Italy, capital of a province of same name, and of the former kingdom of the Two Sicilies, on the north side of the far-famed Bay of Naples, near the base of Mount Vesuvius, 118 miles southeast of Rome. Built in the form of an amphitheater, Naples, as viewed from the sea, presents a panorama of almost unrivaled beauty. Architecturally speaking, its public edifices are more remarkable for their size than for their elegance of design. It has some manufactures and a large commerce. This city, the supposed Parthenope of the ancients, has, at various times, been devastated by the effects of war, earthquakes, and the volcanic eruptions of its neighbor, Vesuvius. The environs of Naples — Capri, Pompeii, etc. — are renowned for their picturesqueness and archæological interest. Population, 563,731.

Netherlands, The, or Holland (Dutch Nederland, or Koninkrijk der Nederlanden), is a kingdom of Europe on the North Sea, north of Belgium and west of part of Northern Germany. In addition to its European territories, Holland possesses extensive colonies and dependencies in the Asiatic archipelago and America; including Java, Sumatra, great part of Borneo, Celebes, part of New Guinea, Surinam or Dutch Guiana, the West Indian islands of Curacao, Saba, St. Eustatius, etc. Some portions of the Netherlands proper are sixteen to twenty feet below the surface of the sea, and nearly all parts too low for natural drainage. The coast line is very irregular, being marked by the great inlet of the Zuider Zee, as well as by various others, and fringed by numerous islands. In great part the coast is so low that were it not for massive sea-dykes, large areas would be inundated and lost to the inhabitants. In the interior also dykes are a common feature, being built to protect portions of land from the lakes or rivers, or to enable swampy pieces of land to be reclaimed by draining, the water being commonly pumped up by windmills. These inclosed lands are called "polders," and by the formation of the polders the available area of the country is being constantly increased, lakes and marshes being converted into fertile fields, and considerable areas being even rescued from the sea. One of these reclamations was the Lake of Haarlem, the drainage of which, yielding more than 40,000 acres of good land now inhabited by about 12,000 persons, begun in 1839, was finished in 1852. Almost the only heights are the sand hills, about 100 to 180 feet high, along the coast, and a similar chain of low hills, southeast of the Zuider Zee. In the same line with the sand hills, extending past the mouth of the Zuider Zee, runs a chain of islands, namely, Texel, Vlieland, Schelling, Ameland, etc., which seem to indicate the original line of the coast before the ocean broke in on the low lands. The coast of Friesland, opposite these islands, depends for its security altogether on artificial embankments. The highest elevation, 656 feet, is in the extreme southeast. The general aspect of the country is flat, tame, and uninteresting, and about a fifth of the whole surface consists of marsh, sand, heath, or other unproductive land. Wheat, of excellent quality, is grown only in favored portions of the south provinces. Rye, oats, and buckwheat, with horse-beans, beet, madder, and chicory, are more common crops; and tobacco is cultivated in the provinces of Gelderland, South Holland, and Utrecht; flax in North Brabant, South and North Holland, Friesland, and Zeeland; and hemp, sugar-beet, oilseeds, and hops in various parts of the kingdom. Culinary vegetables are cultivated on a large scale, not merely for the sake of supplying the internal demand, but also for the exportation of the seeds, which form an important article of Dutch commerce. But it is in stock (cattle, horses, sheep, swine, goats), and dairy products in particular, that the rural industry of the Netherlands shows its strength. The commerce of the country was, at one time, the most important in the world, and is even yet of great importance and activity. The foreign trade centers chiefly in Amsterdam and Rotterdam. The industrial occupations are varied. Shipbuilding and subsidiary trades are among the chief. Of textile manufactures, that of linen is the most important; but silks and velvets, as well as woolens and cottons, are produced in considerable quantity. Pigments, brandy, gin, paper, glass, earthenware, etc., are among the more important products. Large numbers of the sea-board population are employed in the deep-sea fisheries.

New York City, the commercial metropolis of the New World, occupies the whole of the island of Manhattan lying between Hudson and East rivers, in the southeast corner of the State of New York, and large contiguous areas, the total area being 327 square miles. The Greater City comprises the boroughs of Manhattan, Bronx, Brooklyn, Queens, and Richmond. Manhattan, or the city proper, is eighteen miles from the Atlantic, with which it is connected by New York Bay. The harbor of New York, forming the inner portion of its bay, is one of the safest and finest commercial natural basins known, is strongly fortified, and has lighthouses at its respective entrances. Manhattan Island is separated from the mainland of the State by the Harlem River and Spuyten Duyvel Creek. Built on a long, narrow, and gently undulating spit of land, New York, viewed from seaward, presents little that is striking or picturesque to the eye of the spectator. The city, as seen internally, is characterized by all those salient features of space, development, and architectural attraction, which unite in giving it its metropolitan rank. Broadway, its chief street, and one of the finest thoroughfares in the world, extends the whole length of the city for a distance of six miles, and is lined throughout, on either side, by handsome stores and houses. The principal of the nineteen public squares and parks of New York is Central Park, a magnificently and picturesquely laid-out demesne of 843 acres. Among the most noticeable buildings are the city hall, courthouse, stock exchange, customhouse, post-office, United States sub-treasury building, the Roman Catholic cathedral of St. Patrick, and Trinity and other churches, without particularizing the numerous splendid theaters, hotels, hospitals, colleges, etc., which serve to complete the requirements of a large and wealthy urban center. As a manufacturing place, New York carries on various and important industries, embracing the chief articles of fabrication and use required by civilized life. Commercially, its trade is only surpassed by that of London and Liverpool; it constitutes the main American emporium and is the entrepôt of a vast and yearly increasing export and import traffic. New York, too, besides being the financial focus of the Union, is the port at which the bulk of immigrants into the United States arrive. After the discovery of the island of Manhattan by Hudson in 1609, the Dutch permanently settled upon it in 1623, and gave it the name of New Amsterdam. In 1664, it was taken possession of by the English, who rechristened it by its present name. In 1673, the Dutch retook the city, and, naming it New Orange, held it for a year, when it reverted to their immediate predecessors. In 1776, during the War of the Revolution, New York was occupied by British troops from August 26th till November 25, 1783. Since that period it has progressed in size, wealth, and population, till it has become the second city in the world. Population (1908), 4,285,435.

Niagara Falls. The Niagara River, which flows from Lake Erie north into Lake Ontario, is about thirty-six miles in length; its descent from the level of one lake to that of the other is about 334 feet. At the foot of Grand Island, which reaches within one and one-half miles of the falls, the river is contracted to a width of two and one-half miles, and grows narrower as it proceeds. By this, and by the descent in the channel, which is about sixty feet in the mile, are produced the swift currents known as the rapids, in which the river, notwithstanding its great depth, is perpetually white with foam. At the falls, which are twenty-two miles from Lake Erie, the river is divided by an island called Goat Island; but the largest portion of the water is sent down by the Canadian side. On this side is the grander cataract, which has been named the Horseshoe Fall, and which is about 600 yards in width and 154 feet high. The water rushes over with such force that it is thrown about fifty feet from the foot of the cliff. The separation caused by Goat Island leaves a large wall of rock between the Canadian and American falls, the latter being again divided by an islet at a short distance from Goat Island. This fall is from eight to ten feet higher than the Horseshoe, but only about 220 yards wide. The river is crossed by a suspension bridge, and by a ferry about 200 or 300 yards below the falls, where it is 1,200 yards wide. A stratum of rock runs across the direct course of the river, three or four miles below, which, after forming a vast circular basin, with an almost impassable whirlpool, is forced away at right angles to its old channel. The total energy of the falls is calculated at 16,000,000 horsepower, and the work of utilizing this power is the beginning of the most stupendous engineering feat ever undertaken. On April 15, 1895, the first large dynamo was run at full speed, 250 revolutions per minute, and proved quite satisfactory. On July 1st, the first electric power transmitted for commercial purposes, 4,000 horsepower, was sent to an aluminum factory a mile distant. Various other developments were afterward reported in rapid succession. On January 17, 1896, the Niagara Falls Power Company accepted a grant for the transmission of electric power for lighting and power purposes to Buffalo. Electric power is now carried by great transmission lines to various cities of New York and Canada for the operation of interurban and street railways, factories, street lighting, etc.

Nile (Latin, Nilus), a large and celebrated river of Africa, formed by the confluence of two branches, the Bahr-el-Azrek, or "Blue River" (often called the "Blue Nile"), and the Bahr-el-Abiad, or "White River" ("White Nile"). The first-mentioned arm rises in Abyssinia, and taking a northerly course through the Lake of Dembea, joins the Bahr-el-Abiad at Khartoum, after being in some places broken by cataracts. The real sources of the Nile were, until recently, supposed to lie in Lakes Victoria Nyanza and Albert Nyanza, discovered by the English explorer Grant and Speke. After the union of the two branches at Khartoum, the Nile forms one grand main river, taking a generally winding course north, as far as Edab, in Dongola, where it forms what is called the Great Bend. Thence flowing through a country rich in architectural trophies of the past, and rendered highly fertile by its annual inundations, the Nile empties into the Mediterranean by a delta of seven mouths, of which that of Rosetta, the principal one, has a width of 1,800 feet, with a depth of five feet in the dry season. Total length, 3,500 miles from Victoria Nyanza.

Norway is a kingdom of Europe, occupying the western portion of the Scandinavian peninsula. The coast line is extensive, of bold outline, and deeply indented by fiords and fringed with almost innumerable islands, chief among which are the Loffoden group. The surface of the country is rugged and somewhat bleak, comprising a succession of mountains and valleys. The Kiölen, or Great Scandinavian chain, running south from Finland for several hundred miles, forms an Alpine barrier between this country and Sweden; in the province of Drontheim it lapses into the Dovrefjeld, which, with its spurs, extends nearly as far south as the Naze. Highest points, Sneehætta and Skagtols-tind, each over 8,000 feet. Chief rivers, the Glommen and Tana; lakes, those of Miosen, Føemund, and Sperdillen. A large extent of the mountain districts produces only lichens, mosses, and hardy berry-yielding plants; the Scotch fir, spruce and birch cover extensive tracts, and constitute nearly a moiety of the country. The hardier fruits flourish well. Agriculture, though pursued with some vigor of late years, is still unable to furnish sufficient produce for home consumption. Flax and hemp are raised in some parts; in others, barley and oats. Next, or about equal, in importance to the timber trade are the cod and herring fisheries, which employ a very large part of the population during the entire year. In Finmark, the fisheries and reindeer form the only wealth and source of subsistence of the population. The mineral products are similar, but less considerable than those of Sweden. Shipbuilding is largely carried on, and the chief exports include timber, fish, fish oil, minerals, furs, feathers, and ice. Chief cities and towns are Christiania, Bergen, and Trondhjem.

Nyassa, a lake in the heart of Africa, which Dr. Livingstone discovered in 1861, by ascending the River Shiré. The lake is 300 miles long, about twenty-six miles wide, and is 1,300 feet above sea level. It is in many places over 100 fathoms in depth. The scenery of Nyassa is described as grand in the extreme, though much of the land surrounding it is low and marshy.

Obelisk, a column of a rectangular form, diminishing towards the top, generally terminating in a low pyramid. The proportion of the thickness to the height is nearly the same in all obelisks, that is, between one-ninth and one-tenth; and the thickness at the top is never less than half, nor greater than three-fourths of the thickness at the bottom. Egypt abounded with obelisks, which were always of a single block of hard stone; and many have been removed thence to Rome and other places. They seem to have been erected to record the honors or triumphs of the monarchs. The two largest obelisks were erected by Sesostri in Heliopolis; the height of these was 180 feet. They were removed to Rome by Augustus. A fine obelisk from Luxor was erected in Paris in 1833, and the two known as Cleopatra's Needles are now in London and New York, ornaments of public parks. Besides those of Egypt, monoliths of this appearance, but smaller in size, have been found in the ruined cities of Nineveh and Nimrūd. The obelisks which were common to Rome, Florence, etc., had all been removed from Egypt during its domination by the Roman emperors.

Oberammergau, a village in Upper Bavaria, celebrated for the performance, every ten years, of the passion-play of Christ's crucifixion and ascension. The performance takes place every Sunday during the summer, on a large wooden stage open to the sky, and it usually lasts eight hours. Primarily regarded by these Bavarian villagers as a religious exercise, it has become in their performances a mystery play of impressive beauty. Latterly, however, it has taken the character of a European amusement and a source of profit.

Ohio, a river in the United States of America, formed by the confluence of the Allegheny from the north and the Monongahela from the south at Pittsburg in Pennsylvania, where it is a navigable stream 600 yards broad. It flows west-southwest, separating the States of Virginia and Kentucky on the south from Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois on the north, and enters the Mississippi at Cairo. Its length from Pittsburg to its junction with the Mississippi is 975 miles; area of basin, 214,000 square miles. The width of the river varies from 400 to 1,400 yards; average width, about 800 yards, at its mouth 900 yards. Its principal affluents are the Miami, Kentucky, Wabash, Green, Cumberland, and Tennessee.

Ontario, Lake, the most easterly of the great lakes of North America, lying along the northeast side of the State of New York, and forming part of the boundary between the United States and Canada; greatest length, 190 miles; greatest breadth, about fifty-five miles; area, 6,950 square miles. It receives the waters of Lake Erie by the Niagara, and discharges its waters by the St. Lawrence into the Atlantic, 1,000 miles distant. The Hudson, and the Oswego and Erie Canals, form a connection through the United States, between it and the Atlantic. It is navigable throughout its whole extent and at all seasons. The most important places on its shores are Toronto, Hamilton, Kingston, and Coburg in Canada, and Oswego in the United States.

Oporto, the second city of the kingdom of Portugal; in the province of Minho, about two miles from the mouth of the Douro. The city is picturesquely situated on a declivity above the river, and has several well-built suburbs, with one of which, Villanova de Gaya, on the opposite bank of the river, it is connected by an elegant wire suspension bridge, about 750 feet in length. It is the seat of a bishopric, and has a cathedral. The city has some manufactures of hats, silks, linen, and pottery; but it chiefly depends on its trade in wine, of which large quantities are annually exported, chiefly by British merchants. Oporto is the ancient Portus calensis. Population, 180,215.

Oregon or Columbia, the largest of North American rivers emptying into the Pacific, rises in the Rocky Mountains. After pursuing a somewhat devious course it empties into the ocean between Point Adams and Cape Disappointment. At its mouth it is from five to six miles in width. Vessels of considerable tonnage may ascend about 100 miles above its mouth, as far as Fort Vancouver.

Orinoco, one of the great rivers of South America, has its origin on the slopes of the Sierra Parima, in the extreme southeast of Venezuela; its exact sources were only discovered in 1886, by Chaffanjon. It flows at first west by north, a mountain-stream. A little below Esmeralda it divides and sends off to the south an arm, the Cassiquiare, which, after a course of 180 miles, enters the Rio Negro, a tributary of the Amazon. The other branch on reaching San Fernando, is met by the strong current of the Guaviare; the united stream then turns due north, and, after passing over the magnificent cataracts of Maypures and Atures, and picking up the Meta on the left, meets the Apure, which likewise strikes it from the left. Below the confluence with the Apure, the Orinoco turns east and traverses the llanos of Venezuela, its waters, with an average breadth of four miles, being augmented from the right by the Caura and the Caroni. About 120 miles from the Atlantic, into which it rolls its milk-white flood, its delta (8,500 square miles) begins. Of the numerous mouths which reach the ocean over 165 miles of coast-line only seven are navigable.

Orleans (or-lā-on'), English (or'lē-anz), a city of France, the capital of the department of Loiret, about seventy-six miles southwest of Paris. It is situated on the right bank of the Loire, and on the edge of the Forest of Orleans, which is 146 square miles in extent. The city is well and regularly built, and has a large trade, and several manufactures. Its cathedral, which dates only from the Seventeenth Century, is one of the finest Gothic edifices in France. The city was besieged by the English in 1428, and was saved by the heroism of Joan of Arc, whose house is still preserved, and of whom the city contains three statues. It gives its name to the Royal House of Orleans, of which the Bourbons constitute the principal branch. Population, 70,104.

Osaka or Ozaka, an important city of Central Japan, at the head of the gulf of the same name, and at the mouth of the Yodo River, which issues from Lake Biwa. The city covers an area of about eight square miles, and is intersected with canals. Its fine castle, the stones of whose walls are of astonishing size, was constructed in 1583, and the palace, built afterward in its precincts and destroyed in 1868, was perhaps the most magnificent structure in Japan. Population, 821,235.

Ottawa, a city in the province of Ontario, capital of the Dominion of Canada, on the right bank of the Ottawa, about ninety miles above its confluence with St. Lawrence, 100 miles west of Montreal, and on the Canadian Pacific Railway. The city, divided into the Upper and Lower town by the Rideau Canal, has wide streets crossing at right angles, and some of the finest buildings in the Dominion. The chief are the government buildings, constructed of light-colored sandstone, in the Italian-Gothic style. They stand on elevated ground, commanding a fine view, and form three sides of a quadrangle, the south front being formed by the houses of parliament building, which is 500 feet long, and containing the halls for the meetings of the Dominion Senate and House of Commons. There is a library forming a detached circular building, with a dome ninety feet high. The buildings cover about four acres, and are said to have cost $4,000,000. The educational institutions include a Roman Catholic College, the Canadian Institute, the Mechanics' Institute, and Athenæum, etc. Ottawa has important and increasing manufactures, and is the great center of the lumber trade. It is connected with Hull, on the Quebec side of the Ottawa, by a suspension bridge. Ottawa was founded in 1827 by Colonel By, and until 1854 was known as Bytown. On April 26, 1900, it, with Hull, suffered severely from fire. Population, 59,928.

Ottawa, a river in the Dominion of Canada, forming for a considerable part of its length the boundary between the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. It rises in the high land which separates the basin of Hudson's Bay from that of the St. Lawrence, and after a course of some 750 miles discharges into the St. Lawrence above the island of Montreal. Six miles above the city of Ottawa, rapids begin which terminate in the Chaudière Falls, where the river, here 200 feet wide, takes a leap of forty feet. Its banks, mostly elevated, offer magnificent scenery. Immense quantities of valuable timber are floated down the Ottawa from the wooded regions of the interior to Ottawa city, where it is manufactured into lumber.

Oxford, a city and county borough in England; capital of Oxford County, and seat of one of the most celebrated universities in the world; about fifty miles west-northwest of London, on a gentle acclivity between the Cherwell and the Thames, here called the Isis. Of the university buildings, the most remarkable are Christ's Church, the largest and grandest of all the colleges, with a fine quadrangle and other buildings, a noble avenue of trees (the Broad Walk), the cathedral serving as its chapel; Magdalen College, considered to be the most beautiful and complete of all; Balliol College, with a modern front (1867-1869), and a modern Gothic chapel; Brasenose College; and New College (more than 500 years old), largely consisting of the original buildings, and especially noted for its gardens and cloisters; besides the Sheldonian Theater, a public hall of the university; the new examination schools, new museum, Bodleian Library, Radcliffe Library, and other buildings belonging to the university. Oxford depends mostly on the university, and on its attractions as a place of residence. Population, 49,413.

Pacific Ocean, the largest of the five great oceans, lying between America on the east, and Asia, Malaysia, and Australasia on the west. The name "Pacific," given to it by Magellan, the first European navigator who traversed its wide expanse, is doubtless very appropriate to certain portions of this ocean; but, as a whole its special claims to the epithet are, at the least, doubtful, though the name has by long usage become too well established to be easily supplanted by any other. The greatest length of the Pacific Ocean, from the Arctic (at Behring Strait) to the Antarctic Circles is 9,200 miles, and its greatest width, about 10,300 miles; while its area may be roughly estimated at about two-fifths of the whole surface of the earth. Its surface is studded with numerous islands, either scattered or in groups. The deepest sounding yet found in the Pacific Ocean is 26,850 feet, or about five miles — nearly equal to the height of the highest mountain on the globe. The coasts of the Pacific Ocean present a general resemblance to those of the Atlantic, and the similarity in the outline of the western coasts of each is even striking, especially north of the equator. The shore on the American side is bold and rocky, while that of Asia varies much in character. Though the Pacific Ocean is by far the largest of the five great oceans, the proportion of land drained into it is comparatively insignificant. Its basin includes only the narrow strip of the American continent to the west of the Andes and Rocky Mountains; Melanesia; which contains few rivers, and none of them of large size; the Indo-Chinese states, China proper, with the eastern part of Mongolia, and Manchuria in the Asiatic continent.

The currents of the Pacific Ocean, though less marked in character and effects than those of the Atlantic, are yet of sufficient importance to require a brief notice. The Southern Pacific current takes its rise south of Van Dieman's Land, and flows east at the rate of half a mile per hour, dividing into two branches about longitude 98° west, the north branch, or Current of Mentor, turning north and gradually losing itself in the counter Equatorial Current; the south branch continuing its eastern course till it is subdivided by the opposition of Cape Horn into two branches, one of which, the cold Current of Peru, or Humboldt's Current, advances north along the west coast of South America, becoming finally absorbed in the Equatorial Current; the other washing the coast of Brazil and becoming an Atlantic Current. The existence of this ocean first became known to Europeans through Columbus, who had received accounts of it from some of the natives of America, though it was first seen by Balboa, September 29, 1513, and first traversed by Magellan eight years afterward. Captain Cook deserves the first place among the investigators of the Pacific Ocean.

Padua (păd'-u-ä), a walled city of Venetia, twenty-three miles by rail west of Venice, has some manufactures of leather and musical-instrument strings, but is chiefly interesting for its artistic treasures; these include the municipal buildings, cathedral, and nearly fifty churches, innumerable pictures and frescoes, and Donatello's famous equestrian statue of Gattamelata; there is also a renowned university, library, museum, and the oldest botanical garden in Europe; after very varied fortunes it was held by Venice, 1405–1797, then by Austria till its incorporation in Italy, 1866. Livy was a native, as also Andrea Mantegna. Population, 82,281.

Palermo (pah-lŭr'-mo), a handsome city of Sicily, of which island it is the capital, at its northwest extremity. It is built in amphitheatrical form, surrounded by mountains on three sides, and contains many fine churches, and other edifices. Palermo has some textile and other manufactures, carries on an active foreign commerce, and is largely interested in the tunny fishery. The Carthaginians made of Palermo a naval station, 480 B. C.; as later also did the Romans after taking it in 254 B. C. It subsequently passed into the hands of the Goths, the Saracens, and the Normans, and in 1282 it was the spot where occurred the massacre known in history as "The Sicilian vespers." Between 1806 and 1814, it was the seat of the court, owing to the occupation of Naples by the French, and in May, 1860, surrendered to the liberating army of Garibaldi. Population, 340,104.

Palestine, a country of Southwestern Asia, forming the southern portion of Syria, in which most of the events recorded in Scripture took place. It stretches from Mount Hermon to the Desert of Arabia, and is bounded by the Mediterranean on the west, and by the Syrian Desert on the east. The deep valley of the Jordan divides the country from north to south, the surface on either side rising into elevated plains with alternate hills and valleys. The climate is mild and warm, though in the hilly districts the winters are often severe, and snow sometimes falls. The soil may, with care, be rendered exceedingly productive, but agriculture is in a backward condition. In the time of the Romans it was divided into four tetrarchies or presidencies, viz: Judæa, Samaria, Galilee, and Peræa. The first three were included in what was considered Palestine proper; the last embraced the territory beyond the Jordan. There was also a fifth division, Idumæa, part of which lay, however, out of the borders of Palestine. In the Seventh Century this country fell into the power of the Mohammedans, and afterwards of the Turks, which led to the wars called the Crusades. In 1099 the city of Jerusalem was taken, and was, under Godfrey de Bouillon, made the capital of a Latin kingdom, which lasted for above eighty years. In 1187 the country was reconquered by Saladin, and in 1291 the Crusaders were finally expelled. From this time it continued subject to the sovereigns of Egypt, until the conquest of both Syria and Egypt by Selim I., in 1517, when they were brought under the Turkish sway. The country is now a portion of the Turkish Empire. It is divided into various pashalics, the greater part being comprehended within the pashalic of Damascus. Of late years the country has been carefully surveyed, many hitherto doubtful sites have been settled, several geographical problems have been solved, and much light has been thrown upon the history of the country, especially as it is contained in the Bible records. The area of the country is about 6,000 square miles; its population is about 400,000, and comprises Syrians, Turks, Arabs, and about 10,000 Jews, nearly all of whom are found in the sacred cities of Jerusalem, Hebron, Tiberias, and Safed.

Panama, capital of the republic of Panama, capital of the department of the same name, on the Gulf of Panama and on the Pacific coast of the Isthmus of Panama. The city lies on a tongue of land, across which its streets stretch from sea to sea. The harbor is shallow, but affords secure anchorage. Panama is chiefly important as the terminus of the interoceanic railway, and also of the proposed Panama Canal. The railway, which has been in operation since 1855, runs across the isthmus from Panama to Colon or Aspinwall on the Atlantic, and accommodates a large traffic. Population, 30,000.

Panama, Republic of. Was formerly a department of the Republic Colombia, and asserted its independence on November 4, 1903, and the government was established on November 13th. Its extreme length is about 480 miles, and its breadth varies between thirty-seven and 110 miles. The total area is 33,800 square miles, and the population about 400,000. The inhabitants are of a mixed race, comprising Spanish, Indian, and Negro elements, with a small number of temporary immigrants from the United States and Germany, and other European countries. Chinese laborers are estimated at 2,000. The Indian element preponderates in the Cordillera region and towards the west, while there are about 40,000 negroes on the Atlantic coast and inland, especially in the neighborhood of the railway. Agriculture and cattle-breeding are the leading industries, but the climate is generally unhealthy. The soil of Panama is of great fertility, and the climate induces luxuriant growth of tropical vegetation. But of the whole area about five-eighths are unoccupied, and of the remainder only a small part is properly cultivated. The most important product is the banana, which grows freely on the lands adjacent to the Chiriqui Lagoon. In this neighborhood the United Fruit Company (a United States company) has large plantations and exports annually from Bocas del Toro about two and one-half million bunches of bananas, worth about $700,000. Caoutchouc is collected by the Indians of the Cordillera, or is obtained from trees planted by Europeans near the coast. Coffee is grown in the province of Chiriqui, near the Costa Rican frontier. In the province of Coclé (Atlantic coast) there is one large agricultural undertaking, begun in 1894, with German capital. Here about 75,000 cocoa trees, 50,000 coffee bushes, and 25,000 caoutchouc trees have been planted, and are now beginning to yield returns. Other products of the soil of Panama are cocoanuts, mahogany, and other woods, copaiba, sarsaparilla, and ipecacuanha. Cattle rearing is carried on successfully in the provinces of Chiriqui, Los Santos, Coclé, and Veraguas, and hides form an important article of export. Pearl fishing is carried on at the Pearl Islands in the Gulf of Panama, and at Coiba Island to the west. Turtle-shell is also exported to a considerable amount. For the development of the mineral resources of Panama little has been done, but there are two mining companies now at work, on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts.

On November 18, 1903, a treaty between the United States and Panama was signed, providing for the construction and maintenance of the Inter-Oceanic Canal. In this treaty, Panama granted in perpetuity the use of a zone five miles wide on each side of the canal route, and within this zone the exclusive control for police, judicial, sanitary, and other purposes. For sub-city area canals other territory was conceded, and for the defense of the canal, the coast line of the zone and the islands in Panama Bay were also conceded. The cities of Panama and Colon remain under the authority of the new State, but complete jurisdiction was granted to the United States in both the cities, and in their harbors in all that relates to sanitation and quarantine. In return for these grants the United States paid $10,000,000 on the ratification of the treaty, and will pay $250,000 yearly, beginning after nine years. This treaty was ratified on February 23, 1904, and in July, 1904, the provisional delimitation of the boundaries of the United States territory on the isthmus was signed.

Panama Canal. Under the superintendence of M. de Lesseps, a company was formed in 1881 for the construction of a ship canal, forty-six miles in length, across the Isthmus of Panama, mainly following the line of the railway. The capital received up to June 30, 1886, amounted to 772,545,412 francs; and it was expected that before the undertaking was completed this would have to be nearly doubled. The company, being unable to proceed, was compelled to go into liquidation, and suspend payment and all operations on the canal (from March 15, 1889). In March, 1893, a further extension was granted for the organization of a new company to take over the business; in 1894 a new company was formed, which obtained a concession for ten years, extended in 1900 by six years, so as to terminate in April, 1910. By that time the canal, according to the annual report of 1899, might be completed at a cost of 512,000,000 francs ($10,000,000). On January 4, 1902, the board of the company offered to sell to the United States all their rights and property. In view of this offer the United States Isthmian Canal Commission recommended the Panama route, and on January 22, 1903, a treaty was signed whereby the United States would have obtained a lease of the necessary strip of land for 100 years, renewable at the pleasure of the United States, but this treaty was in August, 1903, rejected by the Colombian Congress. A canal treaty between the United States and Panama was signed on November 18, 1903. This treaty is closely associated with the separate existence of the Panama Republic, and its general terms are given above, under the head of "Government." The treaty between Great Britain and the United States, signed November 18th, and ratified by the United States Senate December 16, 1901, provides for the neutralization of the inter-oceanic canal by whatever route it may be constructed, and for its use on equal terms by vessels of all nations. In June, 1906, it was decided that the canal should be of the lock type. Seven years is the period estimated for the completion of the Culebra section of the canal, and eight years for the construction of the dam and locks at Gatun.

Pantheon, The (pan'-the-on), Rome, midway between the Corso and Piazza Navona. The Pantheon was erected by Agrippa, son-in-law of Augustus, B. C. 27. There has been much discussion as to the original purpose of the building, but the name Pantheon was in use as early as A. D. 59. In 399 it was closed as a temple by decree of Honorius, and in 608 it was consecrated as a Christian Church, to which latter fact its preservation is doubtless due. The Pantheon is the only building of Ancient Rome not now in ruins; excavations and removals are in progress to ascertain, if possible, its connection with the other ancient structures.

In 645, Emperor Constans II. carried away the gilt bronze tiling of its roof; and Urban VIII. plundered it of 450,000 pounds of bronze for the baldacchino of St. Peter's, and for cannons for St. Angelo; adding, by way of compensation, the two impertinent campaniles, appreciatively called "asses' ears"; and finally, Benedict XIV. pillaged it of the marbles lining the attic. Notwithstanding all of which it is to-day one of the most pleasing structures of Rome. Within the wall, directly opposite the entrance, is the tomb of Victor Emmanuel. Around the sides are seven recesses, which formerly contained statues of the gods, Jupiter being in the center; between these are eight ædiculæ, in which are modern altars. Among the artists entombed in the Pantheon are Raphael, An. Carracci, Taddeo Zuccaro, and Peruzzi. Raphael's tomb is behind the third chapel to the left. On either side of Raphael are buried Carracci and Zuccaro.

Papal States, the name given to that portion of Central Italy of which the pope was sovereign by virtue of his position. The territory extended irregularly from the Adriatic to the Mediterranean, and latterly comprised an area of 15,289 square miles, with 3,126,000 inhabitants. Rome was the capital. The foundation of the Papal States was laid in 754, when Pepin le Bref presented the exarchate of Ravenna to Stephen II., Bishop of Rome. Benevento was added in 1053, and in 1102 Matilda of Tuscany left Parma, Modena, and Tuscany to the pope. In 1201 the Papal States were formally constituted an independent monarchy. Subsequently various territories were added to or subtracted from the pope's possessions, which were incorporated with France by Napoleon in 1809, but restored to the pope in 1814. A revolution broke out in Rome in 1848, and the pope fled to Gaeta, but he was reinstated by French troops, and Rome was garrisoned by French soldiers until 1870. In the meantime one state after another threw off its allegiance to the pope and joined the kingdom of Italy, and when the French left Rome in August, 1870, King Victor Emmanuel took possession of the city, declared it the capital of Italy, and thus abolished the temporal power of the pope.

Parthenon, a celebrated temple of Athena (Minerva) at Athens, erected under the superintendence of Phidias, during the administration of Pericles, about 440 B. C. The Parthenon was 227 feet long by 101 feet broad, and sixty-five feet high; and it was built entirely of Pentelic marble, in the purest style of Doric architecture. In 1687, during a siege of Athens by the Venetians, a bomb exploded in the very center of the building, and threw down much of both the side walls. The ruins are still, however, in sufficient preservation to give a good idea of the ancient structure. A large number of fragments of the Parthenon were taken to England by Lord Elgin in 1812, and are preserved in the British Museum. A model of the Parthenon, still unfinished, stands on the Calton Hill, in the city of Edinburgh. It was founded in 1822 as a national monument, intended to commemorate the Scotchmen who had fallen in the wars consequent on the French Revolution; but after £13,000 had been expended, the design was not prosecuted further.

Paris, the capital of France and of the department of the Seine. The city lies in the Seine valley, surrounded by heights, those on the north being Charonne La Villette, the Buttes-Chaumont, and Montmartre, those on the south, St. Geneviève, Montrouge, and the Butte-aux-Cailles. Through the valleys between these heights the river runs from east to west, inclosing two islands, upon which part of the city is built. It is navigable by small steamers. The quays or embankments, which extend along the Seine on both sides, being built of solid masonry, protect the city from inundation, and form excellent promenades. The river, which within the city is fully 530 feet in width, is crossed by numerous bridges, the more important being Pont Neuf, Pont des Arts, Pont du Carrousel, Pont Royal, Pont de l'Alma, etc. The city is surrounded by a line of fortifications, which measures twenty-two miles; outside of this is the enceinte, while beyond that again are the detached forts. These now form two main lines of defense. The inner line consists of sixteen forts, the outer line of eighteen forts, besides redoubts. In the older parts of the city the streets are narrow and irregular, but in the newer districts the avenues are straight, wide, and well-paved. What are known as "the boulevards" include the interior, exterior, and military. That which is specifically called "The Boulevard" extends, in an irregular arc on the north side of the Seine, from the Place de la Bastille in the east to the Place de la Madeleine in the west. It includes the Boulevards du Temple, St. Martin, St. Denis, des Italiens, Capuchins, Madeleine, etc., and its length of nearly three miles forms the most stirring part of the city. Here may be noted also the magnificent triumphal arches of Porte St. Denis and Porte St. Martin, the former of which is seventy-two feet in height. On the south side of the Seine the boulevards are neither so numerous nor so extensive. Among the many public squares or places, is the Place de la Concorde, one of the largest and most elegant squares in Europe, surrounded by fine buildings, and adorned by an Egyptian obelisk, fountains, and statues. But the most extensive parks are outside the city. Of these the Bois de Boulogne, on the west, covers an area of 2,150 acres, gives an extensive view toward St. Cloud and Mount Valerien, comprises the race courses of Long-champs and Auteuil, and in it are situated lakes, an aquarium, conservatories, etc. The Bois de Vincennes, on the east, even larger, is similarly adorned with artificial lakes and streams, and its high plateau offers a fine view over the surrounding country. Of the churches of Paris the most celebrated is the Cathedral of Notre Dame, situated on one of the islands of the Seine, called the Ile de la Cité. It is a vast cruciform structure, with a lofty west front, flanked by two square towers, the walls sustained by many flying buttresses, and the east end octagonal. The whole length of the church is 426 feet, its breadth 164 feet. The foundation of Notre Dame belongs to the Sixth Century; the present edifice dates from 1163; but was restored in 1845. The interior decorations are all modern. Saint Chapelle is said to be the finest Gothic masterpiece extant. The Panthéon, originally meant for a church, is the burial-place of the great men of the country, where lie the remains of Voltaire, Rousseau, and Carnot. Notable among the public buildings of Paris are its palaces. The Louvre, a great series of buildings within which are two large courts, is now devoted to a museum which comprises splendid collections of sculpture, paintings, engravings, bronzes, pottery, Egyptian and Assyrian antiquities, etc.; the palace of the Tuileries, the Palais du Luxembourg, the Palais Royal, the Palais de l'Elysee, and many others. A notable and unique structure is the Eiffel Tower, built in connection with the Paris Exhibition of 1900, and which is to have a permanent existence. It is a structure of iron lattice-work, 984 feet high, and having three stages or platforms. It is as yet the highest building in the world. The University Schools in the Quartier Latin attract the youth of all France; the chief are the Schools of Medicine and Law, the Scotch College, the College of France, and the Sorbonne, the seat of the faculties of letters, science, and Protestant theology.

The first appearance of Paris in history is on the occasion of Cæsar's conquest of Gaul, when the small tribe of the Parisii were found inhabiting the banks of the Seine, and occupying the island now called Ile de la Cité. It was a fortified town in 360 A. D., when the soldiers of Julian here summoned him to fill the imperial throne. In the beginning of the Fifth Century it suffered much from the northern hordes, and ultimately fell into the hands of the Franks, headed by Clovis, who made it his capital in 508. In 987 a new dynasty was established in the person of Hugh Capet, from whose reign downward Paris has continued to be the residence of the kings of France. In 1437 and 1438, under Charles VII., Paris was ravaged by pestilence and famine. Under Louis XI. a course of prosperity again commenced. In the reign of Louis XIV. the Paris walls were levelled to the ground after having stood for about 300 years, and what are now the principal boulevards were formed on their site (1670). Only the Bastille was left (till 1789), and in place of the four principal gates of the old walls, four triumphal arches were erected, two of which, the Porte St. Denis and Porte St. Martin, still stand. Many of the finest edifices of Paris were destroyed during the Revolution, but the work of embellishment was resumed by the Directory, and continued by all subsequent governments. The reign of Napoleon III. is specially noteworthy in this respect; during it Paris was opened up by spacious streets and beautified to an extent surpassing all that had hitherto been effected by any of his predecessors. The most recent events in the history of Paris are the siege of the city by the Germans in the war of 1870-1871, and the subsequent siege carried on by the French national government in order to wrest the city from the hands of the Commune. Paris has been the scene of international exhibitions in the years 1855, 1867, 1878, 1889, and 1900. Population, 2,810,915.

Patagonia, the name applied to that extreme portion of South America which is bounded east by the Atlantic, west by the Pacific, south by the Strait of Magellan, and north by the Rio Negro. Since 1881 this large territory has been, by treaty, divided between Chile and the Argentine Republic, so that the portion west of the Andes (63,000 square miles) belongs now to the former, and the portion east of the Andes (360,000) belongs to the latter. The Straits of Magellan form a southern boundary of 360 miles, and separate the mainland from the numerous islands of Tierra del Fuego. Here the Chilean Government has established the settlement of Punta Arenas, with stations along the coast. Patagonia, east of the Andes, consists mainly of vast undulating plains, frequently covered with shingle and broken up by ridges of volcanic rock. The vegetation is scanty, except in the region adjoining the Andes, and in many places there are shallow salt lakes and lagoons. The chief rivers are the Rio Negro, the Chupat, the Rio Desire, and the Rio Chico, all of which have their sources in the Andes, and run east. There are few, if any, good seaports. The Patagonians are a tall, muscular race, averaging fully six feet in height, with black hair, thick lips, and skin of a dark brown color. They are a nomad race, divided into numerous tribes, whose chief occupation is in hunting and cattle breeding. This native population is rapidly disappearing. Colonization is encouraged by the Argentine Government, and there are many tracts suitable for European settlement. The country was first discovered by Magellan in 1520.

Paul's (St.) Cathedral, London, is situated on Ludgate Hill, an elevation on the north bank of the Thames. The site of the present building was originally occupied by a church erected by Ethelbert, King of Kent, in 610. This was destroyed by fire in 1087, and another edifice, Old St. Paul's, was shortly afterwards commenced. The structure was in the Gothic style, in the form of a Latin cross, 690 feet long, 130 feet broad, with a lead-covered wooden spire rising to the height of 520 feet. The middle aisle was termed Paul's Walk, from its being frequented by idlers, as well as money-lenders and general dealers. Old St. Paul's was much damaged by a fire in 1137, by lightning in 1444, again by fire in 1561, and was utterly destroyed by the great fire in 1666. The ruins remained for about eight years, when the rebuilding was taken in hand by the government of Charles II. (1675-1710). The whole building was completed at a total cost of $7,500,000, under one architect (Sir Christopher Wren), one master-mason (Thomas Strong), and one Bishop of London (Dr. Henry Compton). The building is of Portland stone, in the form of a cross. Its length is 510 feet; the width from north to south portico 282 feet; the general height is 100 feet. The whole is surmounted by a great dome raised on eight arches. Above the dome is a lantern or gallery terminated above by a ball and gilded cross, 464 feet from the pavement beneath. The elevated portico, forming the grand entrance, consists of twelve Corinthian columns, with an upper series of eight pillars of the composite order, supporting a pediment; the front being flanked by two bell-towers, 120 feet in height. The entablature represents in relief the conversion of St. Paul, a work of Francis Bird. Upon the south front, which corresponds with the north, is a phoenix rising from the flames, with the motto, "Resurgam" (I shall rise again). The pavement of the interior is composed of slabs of black and white marble. The crypt under the nave contains the burying-places of many illustrious personages, and some interesting relics of old St. Paul's. Among the numerous monuments and statues to the illustrious dead may be noted those of John Howard and Dr. Johnson, by Bacon; statues of Nelson, Earl Howe, and Sir Joshua Reynolds, by Flaxman; Bishop Heber, by Chantrey; and monuments to Lord Rodney, Lord Heathfield, Admiral Collingwood, General Abercrombie, etc., by Rossi, Westmacott, and others. The monument to the Duke of Wellington, by Alfred Stevens, is accounted the finest work of its kind in England. It consists of a rich marble sarcophagus and canopy, elaborately ornamented with bronze sculptures. It is thirty feet in height and cost upwards of $150,000. Various decorative, structural, and other improvements have recently been made on the interior of the cathedral.

Peking, or Pekin, the capital of the Chinese Empire, Province of Chihle, or Pechili, in a vast sandy plain, between the Pei-ho and its important affluent, the Hoang-ho, 562 miles northwest of Nankin, and 100 miles west-northwest of the Gulf of Pechili, in the Yellow Sea. It consists of two contiguous cities, each separately surrounded by walls, and together entered by sixteen gates. The entire circumference is twenty-five miles. The northern city, which is nearly a perfect square, consists of three enclosures. The outer one is used by Chinese traders. The second enclosure contains the residences of the dignitaries of the empire and foreign legations, the national literary institutions, and the temples of Ancestors and Peace, and is inhabited mostly by the Manchus. The inner enclosure, or "forbidden city," surrounded by walls of yellow tiles, two miles in circumference, hence called the "Yellow Wall," contains the palaces of the emperor and empress. The southern city, called the Wai-ching, or "outer city," is also square, and occupied by the Chinese, and is both the seat of business and the residence of most of the population. The wall is thirty feet high, twenty-five feet thick at the base, and twelve feet at the top. That of the imperial city is forty feet high. The principal streets are very wide and regular, running between opposite gates. The houses are generally one story high, and built of brick. Of the ornamental buildings, the most conspicuous are those commonly called triumphal arches. They consist of a large central gateway, with small ones on each side, all covered with narrow roofs, and, like the houses, are splendidly gilded, varnished, and painted. Peking is indebted for its importance to its being the residence of the emperor and the seat of government. The country round the city being sandy and poor, a large portion of its supplies are brought from a distance — partly from sea by the Pei-ho, but principally by the Grand Canal and the Eu-ho, which connect it with Nankin, and most of the eastern provinces. The early history of Peking is involved in obscurity. Kublai Khan rebuilt it, and made it his capital in 1260. The Mongol dynasty, founded by Kublai Khan, continued to occupy this city till it was expelled from China, in 1367. In 1421, the third emperor of the Chinese dynasty of Ming transferred his residence thither from Nankin, since which it has been the capital of the empire. During the "Boxer" uprising of 1900 the various foreigners in Peking were besieged in the English legation. For weeks they were given up as lost, but they managed to hold out till the arrival of the foreign troops. Population (about), 1,700,000.

Peloponnesus, the ancient name of the peninsula which forms the southern part of Greece, now called the "Morea." It is said to have derived its name from Pelops, a son of Tantalus, King of Phrygia, and grandson of Zeus (Jupiter), who was celebrated in Greek fable, and by whom the country was said to have been settled about 1280 B. C. The "Peloponnesian War," between the Athenians and the people of the Peloponnesus (431-404 B. C.) is the most famous of the wars of Greece. The area of the peninsula is 8,263 square miles, and its population about 1,500,000, divided among the five provinces, or nomarchies, of Argolis and Corinth, Achaia and Elis, Arcadia, Messenia, and Laconia.

Persia (native name Iran), the most extensive, opulent, and powerful kingdom of Western Asia, is bounded north by the Caspian Sea, Asiatic Russia and Turkestan, east by Afghanistan and Beloochistan, south by the Persian Gulf and west by the Turkish territories. Length from north to south, about 700 miles; breadth, 900 miles. The surface of Persia is for the greater part a vast plateau, broken in upon in the north by the Elborz Mountains, and in the west and south by various isolated ranges. In the more east and northeast parts are found the Great Salt Desert, and that of Luth. Persia is drained by the Aras, Kerkhas, etc., but has scarcely a river that can be termed navigable, though some of them extend several hundred miles in length, and possess great volumes of water. Some of its immense valleys abound with vegetable productions; among them are wheat of the very best quality, barley, and other cereals; cotton, sugar, rice, and tobacco. The vine flourishes in many of the provinces, and the wines of Shiraz are celebrated. The mulberry tree is largely cultivated, silk being one of the most important staples of the country. The chief manufacture is that of silk stuffs, of the richest kinds, textile goods, arms, carpets, shawls etc. Persian commerce is very extensive, and chiefly carried on with Russia via the Caspian Sea, and with British India by way of the Persian Gulf.

Phenicia (fē-nish'yä), the name given by the Greeks and Romans to a fertile province of Syria, on the western declivity of Lebanon, and bordering upon the Mediterranean. Its limits varied at different times; generally it was included within two degrees of latitude, and was of narrow breadth. Its inhabitants were enterprising navigators, and the country has been called "the birthplace of commerce." Phenician pilots and sailors navigated the vessels of Solomon; and, before other ships had ventured to lose sight of their own shores, colonies of this people were established in some of the most distant parts of Europe, Asia, and Africa. They were also distinguished for their knowledge of the arts and sciences. Phenician workmen were employed at the building of the Temple of Solomon, and by Phenicians the knowledge and use of letters were introduced into Greece. The climate of the country is mild; the land is abundantly watered; and it yields large crops of fruit, corn, cotton, and sugar. But its once populous and opulent cities are reduced, under the rule of a despotic government, to impoverished villages or masses of ruins. Under the Romans, Phenicia formed a part of the Province of Syria. Since the beginning of the Sixteenth Century, it has formed a part of the Turkish Empire.

Philadelphia, is coextensive with Philadelphia County, Pa., and is situated on the Delaware and Schuylkill rivers, eighty-five miles southwest of New York. It is the largest city of Pennsylvania and the third largest in the United States. The city is built chiefly on a low peninsula between the two rivers. There is a water frontage on the Delaware River of over sixteen miles, of which more than five miles have docks. The harbor has been greatly improved by the removal of the islands in the middle of the river, and in front of the wharves there is an average depth of fifty feet. Among the attractions of the city is Fairmount Park, one of the largest public parks in the world, extending more than seven miles on both banks of the Schuylkill River, and more than six miles on both banks of Wissahickon Creek, giving it an area of over 3,000 acres. In 1876, the Centennial Exposition was held here. Memorial Hall, erected at a cost of $1,500,000, which was used for the art gallery of the Exposition, now contains a permanent industrial and art collection. Here also is the Horticultural Building filled with tropical and other plants and surrounded by thirty-five acres of ground devoted to horticulture. In the heart of the city, at the intersection of Market and Broad streets, stands the City Hall, on a piece of ground which was formerly Penn Square. This great structure, usually called the Public Building, is said to be the largest building in the United States. It is built of white marble and granite. The central tower rises to a height of 547 feet, three inches, and is surmounted by a colossal statue of William Penn, thirty-seven feet in height. The total cost of the building was over $20,000,000.

In addition to these, its chief public buildings comprise Girard College, United States Mint, customhouse, exchange, chamber of commerce, post-office, etc. The State house contains the so-called Independence Hall, a chamber in which sat the Congress which issued the American Declaration of Independence in 1776. The Academy of Music, union league clubhouse, newspaper buildings and Masonic Temple, are imposing structures. In manufactures, Philadelphia ranks next to New York. The chief products are locomotives, sugar, and molasses, men's clothing, foundry and machine shop products, carpets and rugs, hosiery and knit goods, woolen and cotton goods, malt liquors, morocco, chemicals, packed meat, refined petroleum, silk, and silk goods. The great Cramp shipbuilding yards are on the Delaware, just west of the heart of the city. The institutions for higher education include the William Penn Charter School, founded in 1689; the University of Pennsylvania, several well-known medical colleges, and many others. Population, 1,293,697.

Philippine Islands lie north of Borneo and Celebes. They are more than 1,200 in number, with an area of about 127,800 square miles. Luzon, in the north, has an area of 51,300 square miles, and Mindanao, or Magindanao, in the south, fully 25,000. There are upward of 1,000 lesser islands. To the southwest of the Bissayas lies the long, narrow island of Paragoa, or Palawan, formed of a mountain-chain with low coast-lines, cut with numerous streams, and exceedingly fertile. The forests abound in ebony, logwood, gum-trees, and bamboos. To the north of Luzon lie the Batanen, Bashee, and Babuyan Islands, the first two groups having about 8,000 inhabitants, the last unpeopled. The Sulu Islands form a long chain from Mindanao to Borneo, having the same mountainous and volcanic structure as the Philippine Islands, and all are probably fragments of a submerged continent. Immense forests spread over the Philippine Islands, clothing the mountains to their summits; ebony, iron-wood, cedar, sapan-wood, gum-trees, etc., being laced together and garlanded by the bush-rope or palasan, which attains a length of several hundred feet. The variety of fruit-trees is great, including the orange, citron, bread-fruit, mango, cocoa-nut, guava, tamarind, rose-apple, etc.; other important products of the vegetable kingdom being the banana, plantain, pineapple, sugar-cane, cotton, tobacco, indigo, coffee, cocoa, cinnamon, vanilla, cassia, the areca nut, ginger, pepper, etc., with rice, wheat, maize, and various other cereals. Gold is found in riverbeds and detrital deposits, being used, in form of dust, as the medium of exchange in Mindanao. Iron is plentiful, and fine coal beds, from one to four feet thick, have been found. Copper has long been worked in Luzon. There are also limestone, a fine variegated marble, sulphur in unlimited quantity, quicksilver, vermilion, and saltpeter — the sulphur being found both native and in combination with copper, arsenic, and iron. The Tagals and Bisayers are the most numerous native races. They dwell in the cities and cultivated lowlands, 2,500,000 being converts to Roman Catholicism, and a considerable number, especially of the Bisayers, Mohammedan. The mountain districts are inhabited by a negro race, who, in features, stature, and savage mode of living, closely resemble the Alfoors of the interior of Papua, and are probably the aborigines driven before the inroads of the Malays. A few of the negroes are Christians, but they are chiefly idolaters, or without any manifest form of religion, and roaming about in families without fixed dwelling. The Mestizos form an influential part of the population; by their activity engrossing the greatest share of the trade. These are mostly of Chinese fathers and native mothers. Few Spaniards reside in the Philippine Islands. The Sulu Islands have a population of 150,000, and are governed by a sultan, whose capital is Sung.

Pisa (pē'zā), a city of Italy, the capital of a province of the same name, which was formerly a part of Tuscany. The city, which is situated on the banks of the Arno, about eight miles from the mouth of that river, is surrounded by old walls and moats, within which are numerous gardens and cultivated fields, studded with the ruins of convents. Among its old buildings the most noteworthy is its cathedral, in the Tuscan style of the Eleventh Century; to the east of which is the famous Campanile, or leaning Tower of Pisa, a round, marble belfry, 179 feet in height, erected in the latter part of the Twelfth Century. Pisa is the seat of a university, which was founded in 1329. At the Council of Pisa, in 1409, the rival popes, Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII., were deposed, and Alexander V. elected in their room. Pisa is said to have been founded six centuries before Christ. It was a flourishing city in the time of the Romans. At the time of the Crusades its population was not less than 150,000, and at one time it disputed the dominion of the sea with Genoa. Population, 61,279.

Pittsburg (according to its city charter, Pittsburgh), a city, port of entry, and county-seat of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania; at the confluence of the Monongahela and Allegheny rivers, at the head of the Ohio River, 353 miles west of Philadelphia. The city owns a water-works system, costing over $7,000,000. The reservoirs have a storage capacity of 68,000,000 gallons, and the water is distributed through 300 miles of mains. There are in all 230 miles of streets, of which 200 miles are paved. The sewer system covers 220 miles. The city is lighted by electricity. The annual death rate averages nineteen per 1,000. The principal public buildings are the Allegheny court house, the Carnegie Library and Institute, with museum, music hall, and art gallery, and having an endowment of $2,000,000; the United States Government building, the West Pennsylvania Exposition Society's buildings; Municipal Hall; United States Arsenal, and the Western State Penitentiary. The two chief industries are the production of iron and steel; but there are many other flourishing manufactures. The city is well known as the Iron City, for there is nothing in the iron industry which is not here manufactured. The capacity of the iron mills is over 800,000 tons annually, and that of the Bessemer steel mills upward of 400,000 tons. There are in Pittsburg, besides blast furnaces and iron and steel works, over 1,500 manufacturing establishments, employing more than 60,000 persons. The schools are flourishing and their accommodations keep pace with increasing population. There are over 200 churches in Pittsburg. The most important of these are Trinity (P.E.), St. Peter's (P. E.), First Presbyterian, United Evangelical (German), First Baptist, English Evangelical, etc. In 1754, at the suggestion of George Washington, the English began to erect a block-house on the present site of the city. They were driven away by the French, who built a fort at the junction of the two rivers and named it Du Quesne. In 1758, after two unsuccessful attempts to retake the place, the English, under General Forbes, made a third attempt, and the French burned and evacuated the fort. In the following year another fort was erected here, named in honor of William Pitt. The British withdrew from the post in 1772, and it was held by Virginia in 1775-1779. The place was incorporated as a city March 18, 1816. In 1877 a railroad strike and riot occurred in which much damage was done to railroad property and for which Allegheny County had to settle at a cost of $4,000,000. Population, 364,161.

Plymouth, the largest town in Devonshire, stands on the north shore of Plymouth Sound, 250 miles west of London by rail; adjacent to it are the towns of Stonehouse and Devonport. Among the chief buildings are a Gothic town-hall, a Fifteenth-Century church, and a Roman Catholic cathedral. The chief industry is chemical manufactures. There is a large coasting and general trade, and important fisheries. Many sea-going steamship companies make it a place of call. The Sound is an important naval station, and historically famous as the sailing port of the fleet that vanquished the Armada. Population, 107,109.

Po, the largest river of Italy, rises on Monte Viso, one of the Cottian Alps, at an altitude of 6,405 feet, close to the French frontier. It has an entire length of 360 miles, and drains an area of nearly 28,900 square miles. Below Piacenza its stream has from ante-Roman days been artificially embanked along great stretches with double lines of embankments on each side.

Pompeii, a seaport at the mouth of the Sarnus, on the Neapolitan Riviera, founded about 600 B. C. by the Oscans, and after them occupied by the Tyrrheno-Pelasgians, and by the Samnites, till these, about 80 B. C., were dispossessed by the Romans. From that time down to its destruction, A. D. 79, it became a sort of Rome-super-Mare, frequented by the aristocracy. On February 5, A. D. 63, by an earthquake in the vicinity, these buildings were all but leveled with the ground, and some years elapsed ere the fugitive citizens recovered confidence enough to reoccupy and rebuild what was once Pompeii. Revolutionized as it was for the worse, the city, however, retained much of Greek character and coloring, and had relapsed into more than its former gaiety and licentiousness, when, on August 23 (or, more probably, on November 23), 79, with a return of the shocks of earthquake, Vesuvius was seen to throw up a column of black smoke expanding like some umbrella pine of the neighborhood, till it assumed the proportions of a great swarthy cloud, dense with ashes, pumice, and red-hot stones, settling down with a force increased by the rain-torrents that intermittently fell. For three days the flight of the inhabitants continued till Pompeii was abandoned by all who could effect their escape. By the fourth day the sun had partially reappeared, and the more courageous of the citizens began to return for such of their property as they could disinter. The reigning emperor, Titus, organized relief on an imperial scale, and even undertook the clearing and rebuilding of the city. This attempt was soon abandoned, and Pompeii remained a heap of hardened mud and ashes, gradually overgrown with grass—the wall of the great theater and the outline of the amphitheater alone marking its site—till 1592, when the architect Fontana, in cutting an aqueduct, came on some ancient buildings. Unsystematic, unscientific excavations proceeded fitfully till 1860, when the Italian kingdom took in hand the unearthing of the city. This was carried out with admirable ingenuity, care, and success, and it now attracts the pilgrim from every clime for the object lessons it is unique in affording as to the public and private life of antiquity. House construction consists mainly of concrete or brick, and sometimes of stone blocks, especially at the corners. Two-storied, sometimes three-storied, houses are numerous, though the upper floors, built of wood, have been consumed by the eruption. Stores usually occupied the ground floors of dwelling houses, on their street aspect, let out to merchants or dealers as at the present day, but not connected with the back part of the house. They could be separated from the street by large wooden doors, while inside they had tables covered with marble, in which earthen vessels for wine or oil were inserted. The storekeeper had sometimes a second room at the back, when he did not live on an upper floor or in another part of the town. Retail traffic must have been considerable at Pompeii, to judge from the number of those stores along the streets. Only a personal visit can convey an idea of the indoor life of the Pompeians, with whom the absence of glass, the fewness of the openings in the street aspect of the house wall, and the protection of these with iron gratings are among the points noted by the most casual visitor. As rebuilt after 63, Pompeii shows little marble, the columns being of tufa or brick cemented by mortar. A coating of stucco was laid over wall or column and presented an ample field for ornamental painting. This must have given to Pompeii its bright, gay coloring, which, with its reds, blues, and yellows, on column and capital, on wall and partition, harmonize so well with the glowing sunlight of the south.

Port Arthur, a strongly-fortified port commanding the northern promontory enclosing the Gulf of Pechili, in China. It was taken by storm by the Japanese in the war of 1894, but Japan was compelled to restore it, in return for an increased indemnity, by Russia, Germany, and France. China, however, gained nothing by invoking this European intervention, Port Arthur being occupied by Russia in December, 1897, immediately after the seizure of Kiao-Chau by Germany. In the spring following, Russia secured by "lease" both Port Arthur and Talienswan, with other advantages, which gave her the command of Manchuria and a sort of tacit acknowledgment that this portion of China belonged to her exclusive sphere of influence. The Russians, under Gen. Stössel, were successfully besieged here by the Japanese under Gen. Nogi, July, 1904, to January 1, 1905. At the close of the war, the lease was transferred to Japan by the treaty of Portsmouth, in 1905. As the terminus of a branch of the Siberian Railway, Port Arthur is an important strategic point.

Porto Rico, a West Indian island; seventy miles east of Haiti; till 1898 a colony of Spain; area, 3,600 square miles; population, 953,243; capital, San Juan, metropolis, Ponce. Under the provisions of the Spanish-American peace protocol the American flag was officially raised and the island formally transferred to the United States on October 18, 1898. The Spanish form of the name of the island is Puerto Rico; but an act of the United States Congress, approved April 12, 1900, established the official form as Porto Rico. The people are most loyal in their devotion to their new country and are solicitous to be regarded as a part of the United States. While there is a great amount of wealth in the island, and in many places evidences of great prosperity, rich plantations, and promise of a great future for Porto Rico, throughout the interior of the island, the people are poor and their homes are of the poorest character, consisting almost altogether of "shacks" constructed of the palm and covered with a straw thatch or palm leaves. Into the cities and these homes is crowded a large population, variously estimated from 800,000 to 1,000,000. They are generally a peaceful and law-abiding people, and while there is unquestionably some lawlessness, and some small offenses are being committed, they do not exceed, if they equal, the number being committed in the States of a like population. It has been estimated that from 10 to 20 per cent. only of the people can read and write. The people are anxious to have their children educated, and are exceedingly solicitous for the establishment of public schools. There is no starvation upon the island, and while there is great poverty in many places, there cannot be any real starvation in Porto Rico, for the reason that the people live frugally and are content with little, while the soil and the climate are so productive of many of the simple necessities of life that it would be almost impossible to starve a people who live upon tropical fruits and tropical vegetable productions. Vegetables of all kinds known to our climate grow in abundance. Irish potatoes are not a success. There are no plums, cherries, or grapes. It would seem that there would be no difficulty in growing grapes, but so far they have not been tried. Indian corn is raised with some success, and while the ears are small, that is made up by the fact that two and even three crops can be grown yearly on the same ground. This can be grown either in the valleys or on the hillsides. No wheat is grown on the island. At present all flour is imported. The native grasses grow luxuriantly wherever an opportunity offers, from the lowest valley to the highest mountain top, and afford excellent pasture for stock everywhere all the months of the year. They make no hay, but cut it with sickles or the machete and tie it in small bundles, pack it on ponies to the cities, and sell it while it is still green. The cattle grazing in large numbers on the pastures are found all over the island, and are mostly in very good condition, making excellent beef. Hogs are raised to a limited extent, but are of poor breeds, being of the old "razor-back" variety. They are fed mainly from the nuts grown on the royal palm trees. Horses are plentiful. They are small, and used only to ride and as pack ponies and in carriages. The hard work of hauling loads and plowing the land is done with oxen, yoked in the Spanish fashion by tying the yoke to the horns, and they are guided with a whip or "gad." The wagons are mostly two-wheeled carts with large wooden axles. There seems to be a considerable deposit of iron and copper on the island. In some places these are being developed with good prospects of proving paying investments. Traces of gold and silver are also found in the mountains, but up to date prospecting has not developed any considerable quantities of these more precious metals. Soon after the surrender of Santiago de Cuba to the American forces under General Shafter, July 17, 1898, an army numbering 16,973 men was sent from Guantanamo to Porto Rico to take possession of that island. They landed July 25th at Quánica, fifteen miles west of Ponce. Lieutenant Haines, commanding the marines, went ashore and raised the American flag over the custom house, amid the cheers of the people. General Wilson was the first army officer to land, and was welcomed with cheers and a serenade. A portion of the army marched toward the capital, San Juan, but were stopped when about half way by the suspension of hostilities between the belligerent powers. On October 18th the island was formally surrendered to the United States in the city of San Juan. In 1899 a census of the island was taken under the direction of the United States War Department, which by departments gave the following: Aguadillo, 99,645; Arecibo, 162,308; Bayamon, 160,046; Guayamo, 111,986; Humacao, 88,501; Mayaguez, 127,566, and Ponce, 203,191 — total for the island, 953,243. The island has prospered greatly under American rule, and is fast becoming Americanized.

Portugal. The most western kingdom of Europe, occupying the greater portion of western seaboard of the Iberian peninsula. North and east it is bounded by Spain, and on all other sides by the Atlantic Ocean. Length, from north to south, 338 miles; mean breadth, about 100 miles. The surface of the country is generally of a hilly character, receiving the terminal continuation of several Spanish mountain chains — one of which, under the name of Serro de Estrella, pierces the center in a southwesterly direction, and rises in its highest part to an altitude of 7,524 feet above the sea. Further south is the Serrado Monchique, terminating at the Atlantic in the headland of Cape

St. Vincent. The chief rivers are the Tagus, Douro, Minho, Guadina, and Mondego. The soil is, generally speaking, quite rich, but agriculture is much neglected. Wine is the chief industrial product of the country, the best growths of which, known as port, are shipped to England, the United States, and other countries. The exports consist almost entirely of wine, fruits, oil, cork, and salt. Portuguese manufacturing interests include those of the fabrication of textile goods, gloves, metallic, and ceramic wares, tobacco, cigars, etc. The chief cities and towns are Lisbon, the capital; Oporto, Braga, Coimbra, Setubal, Evora, and Elvas; and, in Madeira, Funchal.

Potomac, a river of the United States, formed by two branches which rise in the Allegheny Mountains in West Virginia, and unite fifteen miles southeast of Cumberland, Md., from which point the river flows in a generally southeast course 400 miles, and falls into Chesapeake Bay, after forming an estuary nearly 100 miles long, and from two and one-half to seven miles wide. The largest ships can ascend to Washington. The Potomac forms the greater part of the boundary between Virginia and Maryland.

Potsdam, eighteen miles southwest of Berlin, stands on an island at the confluence of the Nuthe and Havel, and is the capital of the Prussian Province of Brandenburg; a handsome town, with broad streets, many parks and squares, numberless statues and fine public buildings; it is a favorite residence of Prussian royalty, and has several royal palaces; was the birthplace of Alexander von Humboldt; has sugar and chemical works, and a large violet-growing industry. Population, 59,814.

Prague (prāg), a city of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, the capital of the province (formerly the kingdom) of Bohemia. It is situated on the rising ground at each side of the Moldau, about 160 miles northwest of Vienna; and is, with the exception of Vienna and Buda-Pesth, the largest city in the empire. Both the old and the new town stand on the right bank of the river, as well as the industrial suburbs of Carolinenthal and Zizkow; on the left bank are the quarters known respectively as the Kleinsite and the Hradshin, in which dwell the nobility and the higher officers of state. This portion of the city is surrounded by a wall. In the immediate neighborhood of the Hradshin is the White Mountain, 1,300 feet high, the scene of the battle in which the Protestants of Bohemia suffered a decisive defeat early in the Thirty Years' War (November 8, 1620). The Cathedral of Prague belongs to the Fourteenth Century, as does also the university, which was founded in 1348 by the Emperor Charles IV. A large trade is carried on in the city, and several large fairs are held in it annually. It has, however, suffered greatly from war, and so recently as 1848 was bombarded by the Austrians for two days, in consequence of an insurrectionary movement on the part of the inhabitants. The "Battle of Prague," so celebrated in history, in which the Austrians were defeated by Prince Henry of Prussia, and their whole camp taken, was fought May 6, 1747. Population, 245,750.

Providence, a city, capital of the State of Rhode Island, and county-seat of Providence County; on the Providence River, an arm of Narragansett Bay, and forty-four miles southwest of Boston. It is the second city of New England in population and wealth, and is built on a rolling plateau. Providence has upward of 2,000 manufacturing establishments, with a combined capital of about $60,000,000, and employing about 40,000 persons. It is noted for its manufactures of cotton and woolen goods, jewelry, and stoves, and is the largest seat of fine jewelry manufacture in the United States. The other industries include silverware, tools, engines, locomotives, boilers, sewing machines, screws, files, general hardware, yarn, calico, laces, braids, worsteds, broadcloth, chemicals, etc. There is an extensive coastwise commerce and shipping industry, especially in the coal, cotton, and wool trade. There is also an important shell-fish industry. In 1636, Roger Williams, a Baptist clergyman, was exiled from Massachusetts because he opposed its theocratic laws. He first settled at What Cheer Rock, on the Seekonk River, and later at the head of the Providence River, where the Indian Chief, Canonicus, granted him a piece of land. In 1643-1644 local government was formed under a royal charter. Providence received its city charter in 1832, and has been enlarged by annexation of territory from adjoining towns. Population, 198,635.

Prussia (prüsh'ah). A kingdom of Europe, and the principal state of the German Empire, bounded on the north by the Baltic Sea and Denmark, east by Russia and Poland, south by the Austrian dominions and the states of Southern Germany, southwest by France and west by Belgium and Holland. The geographical form of this kingdom is very irregular. Prussia has an extensive seaboard extending along the Baltic from Russia on the east to Denmark on the west. It has, besides, a tract of coast line washed by the North Sea, formed by the Schleswig-Holstein and Hanoverian provinces. The length of the kingdom, taken from east-northeast to west-southwest, is about 775 miles; maximum breadth, 404 miles. The surface is for the most part flat. The principal mountains are those of the Hartz, Brocken, and Riesengebirge. The Baltic seaboard is low and sandy, and forms a number of bays and inlets such as the Gulf of Dantzig, the bays of Swinemunde, Lübeck, and Kiel, the Frische Haff and the Curische Haff. Prussia possesses a large number of navigable rivers in close proximity with each other, viz: the Niemen, Pregel, Vistula, Oder, Elbe, Weser, and the Rhine with its numerous tributaries, such as the Moselle, Lahn, etc. The forests are extensive, occupying an area of nearly 10,000 square miles, chiefly consisting of fir. Its minerals consist of iron, copper, lead, alum, nitre, zinc, cobalt, sulphur, nickel, arsenic, baryta, amber, several varieties of precious stones, and, to a small extent, silver. Salt from the brine springs of Prussian Saxony is plentiful, as is also coal. All metals, salt, amber, and precious stones are Crown property. Agriculture and cattle-rearing constitute the chief sources of employment and wealth of the rural population. The western division of Prussia is noted for its excellent fruits and vegetables, and the Rhenish provinces stand preëminent for their wines. In the kingdom there are upwards of 100 mineral springs, as those of Wiesbaden, Ems, Spa, Pyrmont, etc. The chief cities and towns are Berlin (the capital), Breslau, Cologne, Königsberg, Dantzig, Strasburg, Frankfort-on-the-Main, Magdeburg, Hanover, Aix-la-Chapelle, Muhlhouse, Mentz, Frankfort-on-the-Oder. The seaports (besides Dantzig and Königsberg) include Memel, Swinemunde, Stettin, Lübeck, Altona, and Cuxhaven. That of Kiel is the principal naval station and arsenal of the German Empire. Prussian manufactures consist mainly of silk, woolen, cotton, and linen fabrics; arms, shawls, carpets, leather, pottery, glass, tobacco, and metallic wares. The brewing of beer is a business carried on extensively. The leading exports comprise linens, woolens, hardware, grain, raw wool, timber, pitch, linseed, tobacco, mineral waters; to these may be added horses, horned cattle, salted and dried meats, etc., and from the Rhenish provinces, wine. Education is compulsory, and its higher branches are provided for at the universities of Berlin, Bonn, Breslau, Königsberg, Halle, and Greifswalde.

Pyramids, The a name given in pre-eminence to three rock-built tombs (said by recent authorities to have been used also for astronomical observations and for religious purposes) found in the neighborhood of Ghizeh, near Cairo, on the left bank of the Nile. They are all solid masses of stone or brick, with sepulchral chambers in the center or near the base; and these chambers are reached by a gallery, or passage, which opens from the outside. The first of the Pyramids is said to have been erected by Cheops, an Egyptian King, who lived about 3,000 B. C. It was intended by him, and was used, as his tomb. According to Herodotus, one hundred thousand men were employed for twenty years in building this Pyramid; and ten years were occupied in constructing a causeway by which to convey the stones to the place, and in conveying them there. This Pyramid, called "the Great Pyramid," was originally 480 feet in height, with a base of 764 feet square. At present, it is externally a huge mass, rudely built of rough limestone blocks in steps, and with a platform of considerable area at the top; but it is believed to have been originally covered with a solid marble casing, the stones of which began to be removed about A. D. 1000 for the building or the adornment of Cairo. The second Pyramid is said to have been built by Chephron, the brother and successor of Cheops. Although slightly inferior to the first Pyramid in size, and probably far inferior in quality of masonry, it is still a structure of enormous dimensions, which must have required many years of labor from tens of thousands of workmen. After Chephron, Mycerinus, son of Cheops, ascended the throne. He, too, left a Pyramid, but much inferior in size to his father's, the height of this third Pyramid being only 218 feet, with a base about 354 feet square. Besides these three principal Pyramids, there are nearly forty others included under the general designation of the Pyramids of Ghizeh, or Jeezeh. There are others in other parts of Egypt and in Nubia; and similar structures are to be found in Mexico, and in other parts of the world.

Pyrenees (pir'ē-nēz), a broad chain of lofty mountains running from the Bay of Biscay, 276 miles eastward, to the Mediterranean, form the boundary between France and Spain. They are highest in the center, Mount Maladetta reaching 11,168 feet. The snowline is about 8,000 or 9,000 feet, and there are glaciers on the French side. Valleys run up either side, ending in precipitous "pot-holes," with great regularity. The passes are very dangerous from wind and snow storms. The streams to the north feed the Adour and Garonne; those to the south, the Ebro and Douro. Vegetation in the west is European, in the east sub-tropical. Minerals are few, though both iron and coal are worked. The basis of the system is granite with limestone, strata superimposed.

Quebec, a province of the Dominion of Canada, formerly called Canada East; bounded on the north by Labrador and Hudson Bay; on the east by Labrador and the Gulf of St. Lawrence; on the south by New Brunswick, Chaleurs Bay, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York; on the southwest and west by the province of Ontario; gross area, 347,350 square miles; population, 1,648,898; capital, Quebec. The surface of the province is varied, being diversified by mountains, rivers, lakes, and extensive forests. The chief river is the St. Lawrence, which flows through the entire length of the province. The climate is variable, though salubrious, the temperature ranging from 20° below zero in winter to 90° in summer.

The mineral wealth is undeveloped, but is said to be invaluable. Copper is mined in Brome and Megantic counties; gold in Beauce; iron ore in St. Maurice; and nickel in Pontiac. The other mineral productions include asbestos, apatite, plumbago, mica, slatestone, etc. The soil is generally fertile and is chiefly cultivated near the rivers. About half of the population of Quebec is engaged in agriculture. The chief products include maize, buckwheat, tobacco, peas, turnips, barley, wheat, oats, potatoes, and hay. Montreal and Quebec are the largest cities.

Rain is the return to the earth, in condensed drops, of the aqueous vapors which are continually rising into the atmosphere by evaporation; the condensation being occasioned by a change in the general temperature, by a collision produced by contrary currents, or by a cloud passing into a cold stratum of air. The power of the air to hold water in solution increases in a much higher ratio than the temperature. Hence, when two masses of air, saturated with moisture and of different temperatures, are mixed, the resulting compound is not capable of holding the whole water in solution, and a part is, in consequence, precipitated as rain. As the whole atmosphere, when saturated, is calculated not to hold in solution more water than would form a sheet five inches in depth, while the mean annual deposit of rain and dew is probably from thirty-five to forty inches, it is obvious that the supply of atmospheric moisture must be renewed many times in the course of a year. The quantity of rain precipitated from the atmosphere depends upon a variety of circumstances — on the previous hygrometric state of the unmixed portions of air, their difference of heat, the elevation of their mean temperature, and the extent of the combination which takes place. When the deposition is slow, and the electricity set free by change of state is not suddenly removed, the very minute aqueous globules remain suspended and form clouds; but if the deposition be rapid and copious, and the electricity is more or less suddenly carried off, those particles conglomerate, and produce, according to the temperature of the medium through which they descend, rain, mist, snow, or hail.

Rainbow, the well-known colored arch so frequently seen when the sun is shining during a shower of rain. Sometimes only one bow is seen, sometimes there are two; the second being broader and fainter, and situated above or outside the first. In both bows alike the colors are the same as those in the spectrum, and they are arranged in the same order. In the lower or primary bow the red is uppermost; in the secondary bow their relative positions are reversed, the violet being uppermost and the red lowest. The formation of the rainbow is due to the refraction and reflection of the sun's light by the rain drops. The rays which make the primary bow have undergone two refractions and one reflection, whilst those that make up the secondary bow have undergone two refractions and two reflections. Rainbows are only seen when the observer has his back to the sun, and looks in the direction in which the rain is falling.

Rangoon, the capital of Lower Burmah, and the chief seaport of Burmah, is situated at the junction of the Pegu, Hlaing or Rangoon and Pu-zun-doung Rivers, about twenty-one miles from the sea. Since its occupancy by the British, in 1852, Rangoon has undergone such changes that it is practically a new town, and its population has increased fivefold. The principal streets are broad, and contain many large and not a few handsome buildings. There are the law-courts, post-offices, Bank of Bengal, custom-house, Anglican and Roman Catholic churches, St. John's College, high school, etc. A large and increasing commerce is carried on with British, Indian, and Chinese ports; and an extensive trade is conducted with inland towns as far as Mandalay. The chief exports are rice, timber, cotton, hides, gums, and resins, mineral oil, ivory, precious stones; the imports being mainly manufactured goods. A number of rice-mills have been erected; there is a government dockyard, and steam tram-cars have been introduced. Population, 234,881.

Rastadt, a fortified town in the grand duchy of Baden, about fifteen miles to the southwest of Carlsruhe. It is chiefly celebrated for two congresses, the one in 1714, which put an end to the War of the Spanish Succession, and the other in 1797-99, to negotiate a peace between France and the German Empire. After the close of the latter, the French plenipotentiaries were treacherously murdered at a short distance from the town. A monument marks the spot where they fell. Population, 16,822.

Ratisbon (German, Regensburg), a city of Bavaria, on the south bank of the Danube, about sixty-five miles northeast of Munich. It was formerly a place of great importance, having been, in the Thirteenth Century, the most populous and flourishing city of Southern Germany. It was the seat of the Germanic Diet from 1663 to 1806. Its most remarkable building is its cathedral, which dates from the Thirteenth Century, and which was restored in 1830-38. The city has some manufactures, and ship-building is carried on. The astronomer Kepler, to whom a monument is erected in the city, died at Ratisbon, and is buried there. Population, 48,412.

Ravenna, a city of Italy, and the capital of a province of the same name, situated near the mouth of the river Montone, about four miles from the Adriatic Sea. It has a cathedral which dates from the Fourth Century; but which was rebuilt early in the Eighteenth Century; it also contains many interesting remains of antiquity, the city having been, in the time of the Romans, one of the most important places in Northern Italy, and at that time a seaport. After the downfall of the Western Empire, Ravenna became the capital of the kingdom of Theodoric, whose mausoleum is still in existence, about a mile outside the city. It also contains the grave of the poet Dante, who died at Ravenna in 1321. The place is now of little importance, except for its antiquities. It has some manufactures in silk, and is connected with the Adriatic by a canal. Population, 63,839.

Red Sea, an extensive inland sea, which lies between Arabia, on the east, and Egypt, Nubia, and Abyssinia, on the west; and which communicates with the Arabian Sea by the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb and the Gulf of Aden, and with the Mediterranean at Port Said by the Suez Canal. The Red Sea (also called the Arabian Gulf), is about 1,400 miles long, and 230 miles broad at its broadest part. Towards its northern extremity it is divided into two gulfs, the Gulf of Suez (about 180 miles long), and the Gulf of Akabah, or the Elanitic Gulf (about 100 miles long), between which is the Peninsula of Sinai. The sea is remarkable for its coral reefs, which extend generally in long strips parallel with the shore. It is also remarkable for its numerous islands, which cause the navigation to be difficult, and occasionally dangerous, but there are good harbors on either side. Originally the sea was called the Sea of Edom, which the Romans translated into "Mare Rubrum," or Red Sea. The name "Edom" signifies "red," and this is doubtless the origin of the name; but the waters are said to be in some parts tinged with red, which is due to the presence of certain marine plants. The average depth of the sea is about 100 fathoms; its greatest depth (between Jeddah, in Arabia, and the opposite coast) is upwards of 1,000 fathoms.

Rheims, or Reims (Rēms), a city in the French department of Marne; on the Vesle, 100 miles east-northeast of Paris. It is well built, and from the prevalence of the older style of domestic architecture, has a picturesque appearance. Under the Frank rule it was a place of much importance, and it acquired a deeply religious interest from its having been the scene in 496 of the baptism of Clovis and his chief officers by the bishop, St. Remy (438-533). In the Eighth Century it became an archbishopric, and from 1179, when Philip Augustus was solemnly crowned here, it became the place for the coronation of the kings of France. Joan of Arc brought the dauphin hither, and the only sovereigns in the long series, down to 1825, not crowned at Rheims were Henry IV., Napoleon I., and Louis XVIII. In 1830 the ceremony of coronation at Rheims was abolished. The cathedral, though the towers of the original design are still unfinished, is one of the finest extant specimens of Gothic architecture. It was built between 1212 and 1430. The Romanesque Church of St. Remy (mainly 1160-1180), with the saint's shrine, is nearly of equal size, but of less architectural pretension. Rheims is one of the principal entrepôts for the wines of Champagne, and the hills which surround the town are planted with vineyards. Population, 109,350.

Rhine (German, Rhein), the finest river of Germany, and one of the most important rivers of Europe, its direct course being 460 miles, and its indirect course 800 miles (about 250 miles of its course being in Switzerland, 450 in Germany, and 100 in Holland); while the area of its basin is 75,000 square miles. It is formed in the Swiss canton Grisons by two main streams called the Vorder and Hinter Rhein. The Vorder Rhein rises in the Lake of Toma, on the southeast slope of the St. Gothard, at a height of 7,690 feet above the sea, near the source of the Rhone, and at Reichenau unites with the Hinter Rhein, which issues from the Rheinwald Glacier, 7,270 feet above sea-level. Beyond Reichenau the united streams take the common name of Rhine. Generally speaking, it pursues a northern course till it enters Holland, below Emmerich, when it divides into a number of separate branches, forming a great delta, and falling into the sea by many mouths. That which retains the name of Rhine, a small stream, passes Leyden and enters the North Sea. In the German part of its course the chief tributaries are the Ill, Nahe, Moselle, Ahr, and Erft, Neckar, Main, Lahn, Sieg, Ruhr, and Lippe. In Switzerland its tributaries are short and unimportant, and this part of its course is marked by the Falls of the Rhine at Schaffhausen, where the river is precipitated in three leaps over a ledge of rocks forty-eight to sixty feet in height, and by the cataracts of Lauterberg and the rapids of Rheinfelden. It is navigable without interruption from Basel to its mouth, a distance of 550 miles. Large sums are spent every year in keeping the channel in order, and in the erection or repair of river harbors, both in Germany and Holland. The Rhine is distinguished by the beauty of its scenery, which attracts many tourists.

Rhodesia, the name given to that part of South Africa which has been occupied of recent years by the British South African Company, acting mainly under Cecil John Rhodes. Area, 750,000 square miles; population, 1,075,000. The whole territory is administered by the British South African Company, which was given a royal charter in October, 1889. The River Zambesi flows through it, cutting the

Southern Rhodesia consists of the two provinces of Matabeleland and Mashonaland. The capital and the seat of government of Rhodesia is Salisbury, with a population of 1,800. The other principal townships are New Umtali, Melssetter, and Enkeldoorn. A railway is being built, running inland from Beira, and it will place Salisbury in direct communication with the sea over a line 382 miles in length. Matabeleland lies between the Limpopo and middle Zambesi rivers. The principal town, and the chief commercial center in Rhodesia, is Bulawayo, with a population of 5,000. The extension of the Cape government west railway system through Kimberley and Vryburg to Bulawayo was completed in October, 1897. The distance from Cape Town to Bulawayo is 1,360 miles. Northern Rhodesia consists of the whole of the British sphere north of the Zambesi, lying between Portuguese East Africa, German East Africa, the Kongo Free State, and Angola, with the exception of the strip of territory forming the British Central Africa Protectorate, which is under direct imperial administration. North of the Zambesi the country has as yet been little prospected. Coal has been found on the shore of Lake Nyassa. There are 5,250 square miles of gold fields in Rhodesia.

Richmond, a city of the United States, capital of Virginia, is finely situated on the north side of James River, at the head of tide-water, 100 miles southwest of Washington. The streets are generally wide and well-built, and mostly intersect each other at right angles. There are many fine buildings, including the capitol, governor's house, city hall, federal buildings, buildings of Richmond College, churches, schools, asylums, etc. The State House or capitol contains Houdon's celebrated marble statue of Washington, and in the capitol grounds are Foley's bronze statue of General T. J. ("Stonewall") Jackson and Crawford's bronze statue of Washington, twenty-five feet high, on a pedestal forty-two feet high, surrounded by other bronze statues. Water-power is almost unlimited, and the various mills and factories give employment to numerous workmen. The trade staples are tobacco, iron, grain, and flour. The first occupation of any part of its site was by English settlers in 1609; the city was formally founded in 1742, and became the seat of government in 1780. During the Civil War it was the seat of the Confederate Government. It was invested by the federal armies, and surrendered on April 3, 1865. Population, 86,880.

Riga, a city and capital of Livonia, and after St. Petersburg and Odessa, the third seaport of Russia, on the Dwina River, seven miles from the mouth of the river, and 350 miles southwest of St. Petersburg, via Pskoff. The old town has narrow streets and mediæval houses and stores; but the suburbs are laid out in broad streets with handsome buildings. The chief edifices are the cathedral built in 1204, burned down in 1547, but rebuilt; St. Peter's Church (1406), with a steeple 460 feet high; the castle of the old Knights of the Sword, built 1494-1515, the former residence of the grandmaster of the order; and several old guild houses and Hanseatic halls. Riga was founded in 1201 by Albert, Bishop of Livonia, and soon became a first-rate commercial town, and member of the Hanseatic League. In 1710 was annexed to Russia. Population, 282,230.

Rio de Janeiro, or simply Rio, a city and seaport, capital of Brazil and of the province of the same name, the largest and most important city of South America; on the west side of one of the finest bays in the world, eighty miles west of Cape Frio. The city stands on a tongue of land close to the shore, on the west side of the bay, at the foot of several high mountains which rise behind it. The houses are generally built of stone or brick. The streets are straight, well paved, and have excellent footpaths. The convents and churches are numerous, but none of them can be called fine buildings. Parallel with the beach runs the main street, called Rua de Direita, from which the minor streets branch off at right angles and are intersected by others at regular distances. The imperial palace skirts the beach, and is seen to great advantage from the landing place, which is within sixty yards of its entrance. The other public buildings are the naval and military arsenal, a public hospital, a national library containing about 100,000 volumes. The entrance into it from the sea does not exceed a mile from point to point; it afterward widens to about three or four miles. This city is the chief mart of Brazil. Population, 750,000.

Rio de la Plata, a river, or rather an estuary, on the South American coast, between the Argentine Republic and Uruguay. The estuary itself is about 185 miles long, and 130 miles broad, at its entrance. It is formed by the confluence of the Paraguay, the Pilcomayo, the Parana, the Uruguay, and several other rivers; the total length of the stream, measured from the source of the Paraguay, being estimated at upwards of 2,950 miles. The estuary of the La Plata is not deep; and it has a number of submarine banks all around its coasts, which, along with its strong irregular currents, render navigation difficult. The waters of the estuary are so turbid that they tinge the sea visibly for a distance of 200 miles from its mouth. About 150 miles from the mouth of the estuary, on its southern side, is the city of Buenos Ayres; on the opposite side of the estuary, but nearer the Atlantic, is the city of Monte Video. The area of the basin of the La Plata, from its source to its mouth, is estimated at 1,250,000 square miles.

Riviera (rē-vē-ā'rä), an Italian term for coast-land flanked by mountains, especially applied to the strip of land lying around the Gulf of Genoa from Nice to Leghorn, which is divided by Genoa into the Western and Eastern Riviera, the former the more popular as a health resort; but the whole coast enjoys an exceptionally mild climate, and is replete with beautiful scenery.

Rochester, a city and county-seat of Monroe County, N. Y.; on the Genesee River, 229 miles west of Albany. In the center of the city are the Upper Falls of the Genesee, a perpendicular cataract of ninety-six feet. Rochester is built on a plateau on both sides of the river, 263 feet above Lake Ontario. The city is the trade center of a large and rich agricultural region. In the Genesee River there are three falls, ninety-six, twenty-six, and eighty-three feet respectively, giving abundant water-power for manufacturing. There are over 1,900 industrial establishments, employing upward of 40,000 persons, with a combined capital of about $50,000,000, and an output of about $70,000,000. The most important of these are flour mills, india-rubber goods, photographic materials, cigarettes, shoes, etc. In the suburbs is an extensive nursery, including two great plants for the packing and shipment of garden and farm seeds. Rochester is the seat of the University of Rochester, and the Rochester Theological Seminary. The most remarkable structure in the city and county is the aqueduct which carries the Erie Canal across the Genesee River. It is of cut stone, 848 feet long, with a channel forty-five feet wide, and is supported by nine arches. Population, 182,022.

Rocky Mountains, a name indefinitely given to the whole of the extensive system of mountains which covers a great portion of the western half of North America, but more properly applied to the eastern border of this mountain region, commencing in New Mexico in about 32° 30' north latitude, and extending throughout the continent to the Polar Sea; terminating west of the Mackenzie River, in latitude 69° north, longitude 135° west. The Rocky Mountains in the United States are divided into two parts in Southern Wyoming by a tract of elevated plateaus. The chief group of the southern half are the Front or Colorado Range, which in Wyoming has a mean elevation of 9,000 feet (at Evan's Pass, where it is crossed by the Union Pacific Railway, 8,269 feet). In Colorado it increases to a mean height of 13,000 feet, its highest points being Gray's Peak (14,341 feet), Long's Peak (14,271 feet), and Pike's Peak (14,108 feet). The Sawatch Range, south of the Arkansas River, has its highest peak in Mount Harvard (14,375 feet), with passes at an elevation of from 12,000 to 13,000 feet. "Parks" of Colorado are high mountain valleys, known as North, Middle, South, and San Luis parks, with an elevation of from 6,000 to 10,000 feet, surrounded by ranges 3,000 to 4,000 feet higher. The west border of the San Luis Park is formed by the San Juan Range with at least a dozen peaks over 14,000 feet, and between one and two hundred above 13,000 feet. On the north-eastern side this park is bounded by the Sangre de Cristo Range, in which is Blanca Peak (14,390 feet). The Uintah Range, directly west of North Park, has several points above 13,000 feet; and the Wahsatch Range, which forms the western limit of the southern division of the Rocky Mountains, rises to a height of 12,000 feet just east of Salt Lake City. The northern division of the Rocky Mountains, with the exception of the Wind River Range and the Yellowstone region, is lower and has less impressive scenery than the southern. In Idaho and Montana the groups are more irregular in outline than in the south, and the division into ranges more uncertain. Of these the Bitter Root Mountains in part of their course form the divide between the Missouri and the Columbia. There two ranges reach altitudes of upwards of 9,000 feet, and are crossed by a number of passes at elevations of from 5,500 to 6,500 feet. The Northern Pacific Railway crosses at Mullan's Pass (5,548 feet) through a tunnel 3,850 feet long. The Crazy Mountains, north of the Yellowstone, reach a height of 11,000 feet; other groups are the Big Horn Mountains and the Black Hills, whose highest point is Mount Harvey (9,700 feet). In Canada the highest known peaks are Mount Brown (16,000 feet) and Mount Hooker (15,700 feet), lying about 53° north latitude; the general altitude of this part of the range varying from 10,000 to 14,000 feet. The pass leading between Mount Brown and Mount Hooker, called the Athabasca Portage, has a height of 7,300 feet. The Rocky Mountains contain some of the finest scenery in the world, and are specially rich in deposits of gold, silver, iron, copper, etc., which are worked extensively.

Rome, the capital of Italy, as formerly of the Roman Empire, republic, and kingdom, and long the religious center of Western Christendom, is one of the most ancient and interesting cities of the world. It stands on both sides of the Tiber, about fifteen miles from the sea. The city is tolerably healthy during most of the year, but in late summer and early autumn malaria prevails to some extent. It has been greatly improved in cleanliness and healthfulness since it became the capital of modern Italy.

The streets of ancient Rome were crooked and narrow, till after the fire that took place in Nero's reign, when the new streets were made both wide and straight. In the reign of Augustus the population is believed to have amounted to about 1,300,000 and in that of Trajan was not far short of 2,000,000.

Ancient Rome was adorned with a vast number of splendid buildings, including temples, palaces, public halls, theaters, amphitheaters, baths, porticoes, monuments, etc., of many of which we can now form only a very imperfect idea. The oldest and most sacred temple was that of Jupiter Capitolinus on the Capitoline Hill. The Pantheon, a temple of various gods (now Church of S. Maria Rotonda), is still in excellent preservation. It is a great circular building with a dome roof of stone 140 feet wide and 140 feet high, a marvel of construction, being two feet wider than the great dome of St. Peter's. The interior is lighted by a single aperture in the center of the dome. Other temples were the Temple of Apollo, which Augustus built of white marble, on the Palatine, containing a splendid library, which served as a place of resort to the poets; the Temple of Minerva, which Pompey built in the Campus Martius, and which Augustus covered with bronze; the Temple of peace, once the richest and most beautiful temple in Rome, built by Vespasian, in the Via Sacra, which contained the treasures of the temple of Jerusalem, a splendid library, and other curiosities, but was burned during the reign of Commodus; the temple of the Sun, which Aurelian erected to the east of the Quirinal; and the magnificent temple of Venus, which Cæsar caused to be built to her as the origin of his family. The principal palace of ancient Rome was the Palatium or imperial palace, on the Palatine Hill, a private dwelling house enlarged and adopted as the imperial residence by Augustus. Succeeding emperors extended and beautified it. Among the theaters, those of Pompey, Cornelius Balbus, and Marcellus were the most celebrated. That of Pompey, in the Campus Martius, was capable of containing 40,000 persons. The most magnificent of the amphitheaters was that of Titus, completed A. D. 80, now known as the Coliseum or Colosseum. Though only one-third of the gigantic structure remains, the ruins are still stupendous. The principal of the circuses was the Circus Maximus, between the Palatine and Aventine, which was capable of containing 260,000 spectators. With slight exception its walls have entirely disappeared, but its form is still distinctly traceable. The public baths or thermæ in Rome were also very numerous. The largest were the Thermæ of Titus, part of the substructure of which may still be seen on the Esquiline Hill; the Thermæ of Caracalla, even larger, extensive remains of which still exist in the southeast of the city; and the Thermæ of Diocletian, the largest and most magnificent of all, part of which is converted into a church. Of the triumphal arches the most celebrated are those of Titus (A. D. 81), Severus (A. D. 203), and that of Constantine (A. D. 311), all in or near the Forum and all well preserved structures. It was not till the Seventeenth Century that the modern city was extended to its present limits on the right bank, by a wall built under the pontificates of Urban VIII. (1623-1644) and Innocent X. (1644-1655), and inclosing both the Janiculum and the Vatican hills. The boundary wall on the left or east bank of the river follows the same line as that traced by Aurelian in the Third Century, and must in many parts be identical with the original structure. The walls on both banks are built of brick, with occasional portions of stone work, and on the outside are about fifty-five feet high. The greater part dates from A. D. 271 to 276. The city is entered by twelve gates (several of those of earlier date being now walled up) and several railway accesses. Since Rome became the capital of United Italy great changes have taken place in the appearance of the city, many miles of new streets being built, and much done in the way of paving, drainage, and other improvements. It has thus lost much of its ancient picturesque appearance, and is rapidly acquiring the look of a great modern city with wide straight streets of uniform-looking tenements having little distinctive character. The three finest streets, the Corso and the strade del Babbuino and di Ripetta, diverge from the piazza del Popolo near the north gate. The city is divided into 14 rioni or quarters, twelve of which are on the left bank and two on the right bank of the river. The latter two are the rione Trastevere, the ancient Janiculum, and the rione di Borgo, containing the castle of Sant' Angelo, the citadel, now chiefly used as a state prison, and the Vatican. Besides the great collection of the Vatican, there are ten or eleven public libraries. There are in the city about 360 churches. Preëminent among the Christian temples of the world is St. Peter's church. The chief church in point of antiquity and ecclesiastical dignity is the church of St. John Lateran. Among the principal palaces are the palazzi Doria, Ruspoli, Corsini, Orsini, Giustiniani, Altieri, Ciciaporci, Farnese, Barberini, and Colonna. The Quirinal, formerly the pope's ordinary residence, is now the royal palace, the pope residing in the Vatican. On the Capitoline hill are three palaces appropriated for the assemblies of the magistrates, the observatory, and the fine art collections. There are several palaces which, from being surrounded by extensive gardens, are called villas. Of these the principal is the villa Borghese, the gardens of which form the most fashionable promenade in Rome. There are many squares and fountains in the city. Among the most curious remains of ancient Rome are the catacombs. The Ghetto, the quarter in which the Jewish inhabitants were formerly confined, is a relic of the Middle Ages.

Till the establishment of the Italian kingdom, Rome was the capital of the states of the Church; and it was, at a much earlier period, the capital of the Roman Empire. It was founded by Romulus about 753 B. C. At first only a small castle on the summit of Mount Palatinus, it had grown by the time of Servius Tullius, the sixth of its kings, who died 534 B. C., large enough to occupy the "seven hills of Rome" ("Palatinus," "Capitolinus," "Quirinalis," "Cælius," "Aventinus," "Viminalis," "Esquilinus"), and was hence called "the city of the seven hills." In the time of the Emperor Augustus, the first of the emperors, who died A. D. 14, the population of the city is estimated to have been at least 1,300,000; and in the time of the Emperors Vespasian and Trajan (A. D. 70-117), it is believed to have contained nearly 2,000,000. About 728 the city of Rome became independent under the popes, and it remained (with the exception of vicissitudes) the seat of the Papal Court till the abolition of the temporal power of the popes in 1870. Since then, Rome has been the capital of the kingdom of Italy, only the Vatican being under the sovereignty of the pope. The city is the seat of a university, founded in 1244. Population, 530,179.

Rotterdam, the chief port and second city of Holland, situated at the junction of the Rotte with the Maas, nineteen miles from the North Sea and forty-five miles southwest of Amsterdam; the town is cut in many parts by handsome canals, which communicate with the river and serve to facilitate the enormous foreign commerce; the quaint old houses, the stately public buildings, broad tree-lined streets, canals alive with fleets of trim barges, combine to give the town a picturesque and animated appearance. Boymans' Museum has a fine collection of Dutch and modern paintings, and the Groote Kerk is a Gothic church of imposing appearance; there is also a large zoölogical garden; ship-building, distilling, sugar-refining, machine and tobacco factories are the chief industries. Population, 382,951.

Roumania, a European kingdom, bounded by Austria-Hungary, Servia, Bulgaria, the Black Sea, and Russia; area, 50,700 square miles. It includes the former Danubian principalities of Walachia and Moldavia and the province of the Dobrudsha on the Black Sea. Population, 5,913,000. The capital is Bukarest; other chief towns are Jassy, Galatz, Braila, and Giurgevo. The surface is mainly occupied by undulating and well-watered plains of great fertility, gradually sloping upwards to the Carpathians on the north and west borders, where the summits range from 2,650 to 8,800 feet above sea-level. The entire kingdom is in the basin of the Danube, which has a course of 595 miles in Roumania, forming the boundary with Bulgaria nearly the whole way. Its chief Roumanian tributaries are the Olta or Aluta, Ardjis, Jalomitza, Sereth, and Pruth (on northwest border). The Danube forms a number of marshy lakes as it approaches the alluvial region of the Dobrudsha, through which it discharges itself into the Black Sea by the St. George, Sulina, and Kilia Channels. The climate is much more extreme than at the same latitude in other parts of Europe; the summer is hot and rainless, the winter sudden and very intense; there is almost no spring, but the autumn is long and pleasant. Roumania is an essentially agricultural and pastoral state, fully 70 per cent. of the inhabitants being directly engaged in husbandry. The chief cereal crops are maize, wheat, barley, rye, and oats; tobacco, hemp, and flax are also grown; and wine is produced on the hills at the foot of the Carpathians. Cattle, sheep, and horses are reared in large numbers. Excellent timber abounds on the Carpathians. Bears, wolves, wild boars, large and small game, and fish are plentiful. The country is rich in minerals of nearly every description, but salt, petroleum, and lignite are the only minerals worked. Manufactures are still in a rudimentary state. Trade is fairly active, but it is almost entirely in the hands of foreigners; the internal trade is chiefly carried on by Jews, whose numbers and prosperity are constant sources of anxiety to Roumanian statesmen, and who are in consequence subject to certain disabilities. The chief exports are grain (especially maize), cattle, timber, and fruit; the chief imports, manufactured goods, coal, etc. Germany, Great Britain, and Austria-Hungary appropriate by far the greatest share of the foreign trade, the bulk of which passes through the Black Sea ports. The Roumanians, who call themselves Romani, claim to be descendants of Roman colonists introduced by Trajan; but the traces of Latin descent are in great part due to a later immigration, about the Twelfth Century, from the Alpine districts. Their language and history both indicate that they are a mixed race with many constituents. Their language, however, must be classed as one of the Romance tongues, though it contains a large admixture of foreign elements. In Roumania there are about 4,500,000 Roumanians, 300,000 Jews, 200,000 gypsies, 50,000 Bulgars, 1,500 Magyars, 20,000 Germans, 20,000 Greeks, and 15,000 Armenians. Three-fourths of the population are peasants, who, till 1864, were kept in virtual serfdom by the boiars or nobles. In that year upward of 400,000 peasant families were made proprietors of small holdings averaging ten acres, at a price to be paid back to the state in fifteen years. About 4,500,000 of the people belong to the Greek Church. Energetic efforts are being made to raise education from its present low level. Roumania has two universities (at Bucharest and Jassy), several gymnasia, and a system of free primary schools.

Russia, one of the most powerful empires of the world, second only in extent to the British Empire, and third as regards population, the British Empire ranking first, the Chinese Empire second. It comprehends most of Eastern Europe and all Northern Asia, and is bounded north by the Arctic Ocean; west by Sweden, the Gulf of Bothnia and the Baltic, Prussia, Austria, and Roumania; south by the Black Sea, Turkey in Asia, Persia, Afghanistan, the Chinese Empire; east by the Pacific and Behring Strait. The total area has been officially estimated at 8,644,100 square miles, while the population is as follows:

Russia in Europe (including Poland),	118,400,700
Finland,	2,816,500
Caucasian Provinces,	10,259,600

Siberia,	6,568,000
Central Asia,	8,751,800
	<hr/> 146,796,600

The largest towns are St. Petersburg, Moscow, Warsaw, Odessa, Lodz, Riga, Kieff, Kharkoff, and Tiflis. St. Petersburg and Moscow are the capitals of the empire. European Russia consists almost wholly of immense plains, the Valdai Hills, between St. Petersburg and Moscow, averaging 500 feet and never exceeding 1,200 feet above sea-level, forming the only elevated region of the interior and an important watershed. The mountains include: the Caucasus, running from the Black Sea to the Caspian, reach to the height of 18,500 feet; the Urals, stretching from the Caspian to the Arctic Ocean and separating European from Asiatic Russia, have their greatest height below 7,000 feet. Beyond the Urals are the vast Siberian plains. The whole of the vast empire is watered by numerous rivers, some running a course of thousands of miles. Altogether Russia and Poland have 49,000 miles of navigable rivers. Asiatic Russia has also a number of very large rivers, as the Obi, Yenisei, and Lena in Siberia, and the Amur toward the Chinese frontier. This complete river system is of incalculable value to Russia, as by its means internal communication is carried on. Canals connect the navigable rivers, so as to form continuous waterways; there being 500 miles of canals and 717 of canalized rivers. As may be expected from its vastness, this empire offers soils and climates of almost every variety. Extreme cold in winter and extreme heat in summer, are, however, a general characteristic of Russian climates. As regards soil, large sections of Russia are sandy, barren wastes and vast morasses. The most productive portion is that between the Baltic and the Gulf of Finland, and the Volga, on the north and east; Prussia, Austria, etc., on the west; and the Black Sea on the south. It has, generally speaking, a soft, black mold of great depth, mostly on a sandy bottom, easily wrought, and very fertile. The more southern portion of Siberia, as far east as the river Lena, has, for the most part, a fertile soil, and produces, notwithstanding the severity of the climate, nearly all kinds of grain. Boundless forests exist, the area of the forest land in Europe being 42 per cent. of the total area. The fir, larch, alder, and birch predominate. Most of the forest land is now under government control, and waste is prevented. Agriculture remains the chief pursuit of the bulk of the population. For some years it has, however, remained stationary, while manufacturing industries are steadily going ahead. The chief crops are rye, wheat, barley, oats, hemp, flax, and tobacco. Vine and beet culture are rapidly increasing, and the breeding of horses and cattle is also extensively carried on. Russia is rich in minerals. The precious metals are chiefly obtained in the Ural and Altai regions. The output for 1899 was, gold, 1,072,333 ounces; platinum, 12,339 pounds; silver, 134,887 ounces. In the Ural, iron beds are also rich and numerous, exceeding all others in productiveness. Copper is most abundant in the government of Perm; lead in the Ural and some parts of Poland; saltpeter in Astrakhan. Of the coal mines those of the Don basin are the principal at present, those of Kielce ranking second; the mines around Moscow come next. About 60,000 tons of manganese ore are annually extracted in the Ural and the Caucasus. The petroleum wells of Baku on the Caspian now send their products all over Europe. Prior to the accession of Peter the Great, Russia had no manufactures; he started them, and under the more or less fostering care of his successors and Russia's protective policy they have steadily grown. The latest statistics give a total of about 1,400,000 persons as being employed in the various manufacturing industries. Two-fifths of the entire production comes from the two capitals, St. Petersburg and Moscow. The various manufactures rank approximately as follows: spirits, sugar, cottons, yarns, flour, tobacco, foundry products, flax, linen, leather, woolen cloth, iron, machinery, beer, soap, timber, paper, oil, glass, chemicals, and agricultural implements. The bulk of Russia's external trade is carried on through the European frontier and the Baltic and Black Sea ports. The chief exports are: grain (about one-half of entire exports), flax, linseed, and other oleaginous seeds, timber, hemp, wool, butter and eggs, spirits, bristles, and furs, in the order indicated. The chief imports are cotton, wool, tea, machinery, coal and coke, cotton yarn, metal goods, wine, olive oil, raw silk, herrings, textile goods, fruit, coffee, tobacco. The import trade is heaviest with Germany, Great Britain, France, Austria-Hungary, and Belgium, in the order named. In the export trade Great Britain takes the lead, Holland, France, and Germany following.

San Francisco, the most important city of California, and the principal emporium of the Pacific Coast of America, is situated on San Francisco Bay. The bay, which is fifty miles long by five miles wide, makes one of the grandest harbors in the world, and the principal one on the Pacific coast. The mean altitude is 130 feet above the sea. The city is served by an extensive waterworks system. The reservoirs have a storage capacity of 100,000,000 gallons, and the consumption averages 30,000,000 gallons per day. There are in all 750 miles of streets, of which 192 miles are paved. The sewer system covers 308 miles, and the annual cost of maintaining the city government exceeds $5,700,000. The Golden Gate Park, named after the popular name of the entrance to San Francisco Bay, is the most important park in the city, comprising 1,043 acres. It extends from the city to the ocean. About half of it is beautifully laid out in promenades, drives, lawns, etc. It was here that the Midwinter Exposition was held in 1894. The park contains a magnificent conservatory, and monuments of Francis Scott Key, author of "The Star-Spangled Banner," President Garfield, General Halleck, and Thomas Starr King. Hill Park, lying a half mile east of Golden Gate Park, affords a fine view from its highest point, which is 570 feet above the sea. The Presidio, or Government Military Reservation, extends along the Golden Gate for about four miles, and has an area of 1,500 acres. The city proper was almost totally destroyed by earthquake and fire, April 18, 1906, and following. The loss amounted to nearly $250,000,000; but with marvelous energy the city is being rapidly rebuilt, on a magnificent scale. Population, 475,000.

Scotland, the northern division of the island of Great Britain. The greatest length, from north-northeast to south-southwest, between Dunnet Head and the Mull of Galloway, is 287 miles. The breadth varies from 140 miles to less than thirty, the latter in the north, between Dornoch Firth and Loch Broom. Few points in the mainland are more than forty miles from the sea, the country being so much penetrated by inlets. The most important cities are: Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dundee, and Aberdeen.

The islands of Scotland are said to number altogether nearly 800. On the east coast they are few and small; but on the northeast coast are the two large groups of the Orkneys and Shetlands; while on the west coast the islands are large and numerous. The west coast of the mainland is generally a wild, deeply indented mountain wall, presenting a series of inlets or sea lochs, while toward the middle the coast is cleft by two great inlets with openings to the southwest, the Firth of Lorn and its continuation Loch Linnhe, and the Firth of Clyde and its ramifications running far inland. The east coast is sometimes low and sandy, but is often formed of steep, rocky cliffs of considerable elevation, the chief inlets being the Firth of Forth and Tay, and the Moray Firth, Cromarty Firth, etc.

Both from the configuration of the surface and the geological structure, the country divides into three divisions: the Highlands, Central Lowlands, and Southern Uplands. The first of these divisions lies north of a line stretching in a southwest direction from the coast of Kincardineshire to the Firth of Clyde; the third is the country south of a line drawn from Dunbar southwest to Girvan; the country between these lines forms the Central Lowlands. The Highland division is remarkable for the number and elevation of its mountain-masses, many of the summits being over 4,000 feet high. The mountains best known by name are the Grampians, which form a system or series of masses covering a large area, and culminating on the west coast in Ben Nevis, 4,406 feet high; while fifty-five miles to the northeast rises a remarkable cluster of summits reaching in Ben Macdui the height of 4,296 feet. The Grampians and their connections are separated from the mountains farther to the north by Glenmore or the Great Glen of Scotland, a remarkable depression stretching quite across the country from sea to sea, and forming, by the series of lakes occupying it and the Caledonian Canal connecting them, a waterway from the west coast to the east. The Southern Uplands are also essentially a mountainous region, summits of over 2,000 feet being frequent, though none exceed 3,000 feet above the sea. The Central region, though much less elevated than the other two divisions, has none of the monotony usual in flat countries. Though occupying not more than a sixth of the whole surface, the fertility of the soil and its mineral treasures make this part by far the wealthiest and most populous.

The chief rivers flow (roughly speaking) to the east, and enter the German Ocean, the largest being the Tweed, Forth, Tay, South Esk, North Esk, Dee, Don, Deveron, Spey, Findhorn, etc.; those entering the sea on the west are the Clyde, Ayr, Doon, Dee, Nith, Annan, and Esk. The Tay carries to the sea a larger quantity of water than any river in Britain, but neither it nor most of the others, except when they form estuaries, are of much use for navigation. The Clyde, however, in its lower course carries a vast traffic, this being rendered possible chiefly by dredging. Many of the rivers are valuable from the numbers of salmon they produce. A striking feature of the country is the great multitude of lakes, varying in size from Loch Lomond (twenty-eight square miles) to the pool-like mountain tarns. In the Northern Highlands almost every glen has its lake and every mountain hollow is filled by a stream or spring. Among the more noted are Lochs Lomond, Katrine, Tay, Earn, Rannoch Awe, Shiel, Laggan, Lochy, Ness, Maree, Shin, in the Western and Northern Highlands; Loch Leven, in the Central Highlands; and St. Mary's Loch, Lochs Ken, Dee, and Doon in the Southern Uplands.

Seasons, the four divisions or portions of the year: namely, spring, when the sun enters Aries; summer, when he enters Cancer; autumn, when he enters Libra; and winter, when he enters Capricorn. Hence spring is supposed to commence about the 21st of March; summer, about the 22d of June; autumn, about the 23d of September; and winter, about the 23d of December. The diversity of the seasons depends upon the oblique position of the sun's path through the heavens; in consequence of which this luminary rises to different heights above the horizon, making the day sometimes longer, and sometimes shorter, than the nights. When the sun rises highest at noon, its rays fall most nearly in the direction of a perpendicular, and consequently a greater number is received upon a given spot; their action also, at the same time, continues the longest. These circumstances make the difference between summer and winter.

Shanghai, a city and seaport of China, in the province of Kiangsu; near the junction of the Hwang-pu and the Wu-sung rivers. The Chinese city proper is inclosed within walls twenty-four feet high, the streets being narrow and dirty, and the buildings low, crowded, and for the most part unimportant. In 1843 Shanghai was opened as one of the five treaty ports, and an important foreign settlement is now established (with a separate government) outside the city walls. Shanghai has water communication with about a third of China, and its trade since the opening of the port has become very extensive. The chief imports are cottons, yarns, woollens, and opium; and the exports, silk, tea, rice, and raw cotton. The largest part of the foreign trade is in the hands of British and American merchants. Population, about 600,000.

Sheffield, a municipal and parliamentary borough of England, county of York (West Riding); on hilly ground at the junction of the Sheaf and Don, about 160 miles north of London. In the central parts great improvements have recently been made in the crowded streets by the corporation, and the suburban districts are well built and picturesquely situated. The trade of Sheffield is chiefly connected with cutlery, for which it has long been famous, and the manufacture of all forms of steel, iron, and brass work. The steel manufacture includes armor plating, rails, engine castings, rifles, etc. There are also manufactures of engines, machinery, plated goods, Britannia-metal goods, optical instruments, stoves and grates, etc. Population (1901), 380,717.

Shenandoah, a river of the United States, which flows northeast through the valley of Virginia, and immediately below Harper's Ferry joins the Potomac, of which it is the principal tributary. Its length is 170 miles, the greater part of which is navigable for boats. The valley of the Shenandoah was the scene of numerous military operations in the American Civil War, and was devastated by General Sheridan in 1864.

Siam, an extensive kingdom of southeastern Asia, occupying the middle portion of the Indo-Chinese Peninsula, between British Burmah on the west and Tonquin and Cochin China on the east, and extending southwards into the northern portion of the Malay Peninsula. In the north the country is mountainous, but it stretches toward the south into broad plains, which are well watered and extremely fertile. The minerals include gold, tin, iron, copper, lead, zinc, and antimony, besides several precious stones, such as the sapphire, Oriental ruby, and Oriental topaz. Mining is chiefly in the hands of the Chinese. Cocoa and areca palms are numerous in Siam; fruits are abundant and of excellent quality; black pepper, tobacco, cardamoms, and gamboge are important products. The forests produce aloes, wood, sappan wood, teak, timber, bamboos, rattans, gutta percha, dammar, catechu, benzoin, etc. Among wild animals are the tiger, leopard, bear, otter, orang-ou-tang, single-horned rhinoceros, and elephant, which here attains a size and beauty elsewhere unknown. The last, when of a white color, is held in the highest reverence. Nearly the whole of the trade of Siam is in the hands of foreigners, and the foreign trade centers at Bangkok. The chief export is rice, after which come teak, pepper, dried fish, birds' nests, cattle, and teel seed. The chief imports are gold leaf and treasure and cottons, after which come opium, china goods, gunny bags, hardware, kerosene oil and silk goods. The trade is chiefly with Hong Kong and Singapore, and to a much less extent with Lower Burma and Great Britain.

The Siamese are members of the great Mongolian family, and of the same race as the people of Burma and Annam. The Siamese profess Buddhism, introduced into the country about the middle of the Seventh Century. Christianity is now making some progress in the country. The language forms a connecting link between the Chinese and Malay. The written characters seem to be derived from a form of Sanskrit. By a series of aggressive operations, the French appropriated about 110,000 square miles, the remainder of about 200,000 square miles being guaranteed to Siam by a treaty in January, 1896, between the French and British Governments.

Snow, water deposited from the atmosphere in a frozen condition, the ice being in the form of distinct crystals which have become interlaced one with another, producing bulky light feathery flakes. The atmosphere offers considerable resistance to the passage of these flakes, and consequently the fall of each snowflake is comparatively slow. It appears highly probable that snow is formed when aqueous vapor is condensed in an upper layer of the atmosphere which has previously been cooled down considerably below the freezing-point. Under these conditions the minute particles of ice are deposited one upon another, and arrange themselves in definite crystals. It is found that all these snow crystals have a form derived from the hexagon.

Sophia, Church of St., in Constantinople, the most celebrated ecclesiastical edifice of the Greek Church, now used as a mosque; was built by the Emperor Justinian, and dedicated in 558. It is in the Byzantine style of architecture, has a fine dome rising to the height of 180 feet, and is richly decorated in the interior. The mass of the edifice is of brick, but is overlaid with marble; the floor is of mosaic work, composed of porphyry and verd antique. The great piers which support the dome consist of square blocks of stone bound with hoops of iron. The numerous pillars supporting the internal galleries, etc., are of white and colored marbles, porphyry, granite, etc., and have capitals of various peculiar forms. The interior of the church is 243 feet in width from north to south, and 269 feet in length from east to west.

Spain, a kingdom in the southwest of Europe, forming with Portugal the great southwest peninsula of Europe. It is separated from France on the northeast by the chain of the Pyrenees, and is otherwise bounded by Portugal and the Atlantic and Mediterranean. In greatest breadth north and south it measures 540 miles; greatest length east and west, 620 miles. Spain retains practically none of her once magnificent colonies. The war with the United States deprived her of Cuba, Porto Rico, the Philippine and Sulu Islands, and Guam; and a treaty with Germany, February 8, 1899, of the Marianne (or Ladrone) Caroline, and Pelew Islands. On November 8, 1900, Spain sold the islands of Cagayan and Sibu to the United States for $100,000. Her last remaining colonies are in Africa. The coast line is not much broken, but sweeps round in gentle curves, presenting few remarkable headlands, or indentations. The interior is considerably diversified, but its characteristic feature is its central tableland, which has an elevation of from 2,200 to 2,800 feet, and a superficial extent of not less than 90,000 square miles. It descends gradually on the west toward Portugal; but on the east, toward the provinces of Catalonia and on the north by the Asturian and Cantabrian Mountains, reaching an elevation of about 8,500 feet, and on the south by the Sierra Morena. Besides these ranges, there is the chain of the Pyrenees, which, though partly belonging to France, presents its boldest front to Spain and has its loftiest summits within it. The whole country teems with mineral wealth, the minerals including, in greater or less quantities, gold, silver, quicksilver, lead, copper, iron, zinc, calamine, antimony, tin, coal, etc. The exploitation of the minerals has, however, in recent times been mostly accomplished by foreign capital, while most of the ore is exported to foreign countries in its raw state. About one-sixth of the acreage is under wood; the more remarkable trees being the Spanish chestnut and several varieties of oak, and in particular the cork oak. Fruits are extremely abundant, and include, in addition to apples, pears, cherries, plums, peaches, and apricots, the almond, date, fig, orange, citron, olive, and pomegranate; and in the lower districts, the pineapple and banana. The culture of the vine is general, and great quantities of wine are made, both for home consumption and exportation. The more important farm crops are wheat, rice, maize, barley, and legumes. In the south, cotton and sugar cane are grown. Hemp, flax, esparto, the mulberry for rearing silk worms, saffron, licorice, are also to be mentioned.

St. Louis, chief city of Missouri, on the west bank of the Mississippi River, twenty miles south of the mouth of the Missouri, is the fourth city in the United States in population, and the commercial metropolis of the Mississippi Valley. The city is built on rising ground, comprising three terraces, the highest of which is 200 feet above the level of the river. The city owns an extensive water-works system, costing $20,000,000. There are in all 873 miles of streets, of which 432 miles are paved. The sewer system covers 488 miles. St. Louis has a park system which constitutes one of its most attractive features. The total area of the parks is 2,268 acres. Forest Park, which comprises 1,370 acres, is the largest, and although the land is largely unimproved is probably the most beautiful of the parks. Tower Grove Park, covering 276 acres in the southwestern part of the city, was the donation of Henry Shaw, who also gave the city the Missouri Botanical Garden. The fair grounds, with 137 acres, contain a one-mile race track, an amphitheater seating 40,000 people, many halls, etc. Carondelet and Lafayette Parks are small but fine specimens of landscape gardening. The principal public buildings are the massive post-office and custom-house, costing more than $6,500,000; the city hall, built at a cost of $2,000,000; the courthouse; the union railroad station with a train house covering thirty tracks, and used by twenty-one railroad companies, erected at a cost of $6,500,000; and the Chamber of Commerce building, costing $2,000,000. The St. Louis bridge, a massive structure, was completed in 1874 at a cost of over $10,000,000. It consists of three spans, the center one being 520 feet long, and the other two 500 feet each. The piers upon which these spans rest are built of limestone carried down to bed rock. The main passage for the accommodation of pedestrians, is fifty-four feet wide, and below this are two lines of rails. The merchant's bridge, three miles north, was completed in 1890 at a cost of $3,000,000. The latter is used exclusively for railroad traffic. The favorable location of St. Louis in the heart of the vast and fertile Mississippi Valley makes it one of the greatest commercial cities in the United States. There is an immense trade in breadstuffs, grain, provisions, lumber, hides, fur, agricultural products, manufactured articles, etc. There are about 7,000 manufacturing establishments, with a combined capital of about $150,000,000, and employing upward of 100,000 persons. It is one of the largest tobacco manufacturing cities in the world. The city has direct communication with more than 6,000 miles of rivers. A considerable amount of its foreign trade is entered and cleared at New Orleans. The institutions of higher education are Washington University, St. Louis University (Roman Catholic), the College of the Christian Brothers, St. Louis School of Fine Arts, Maria Consilia Convent, training school for nurses, several medical colleges, dental college, theological seminaries (Lutheran and Evangelical Lutheran), manual training school, the State school for the blind, and the St. Louis day school for deaf mutes. Population, 750,000.

Stockholm, the capital of the kingdom of Sweden; on several islands and the adjacent mainland, between a bay of the Baltic and Lake Malar; in a situation that is accounted one of the most picturesque in Europe. The nucleus of Stockholm is an island in mid-channel called "The Town"; on it stand the imposing royal palace (1697-1754); the principal church (St. Nicholas), in which the kings are crowned; the House of the Nobles (1648-1670), in which that class hold their periodical meetings; the town house; the ministries of the kingdom; and the principal wharf, a magnificent granite quay, fronting east. Immediately west of the central island lies the Knights' Island; it is almost entirely occupied with public buildings, as the houses of parliament; the old Franciscan Church, in which all the later sovereigns of Sweden have been buried; the royal archives; and the chief law courts of the kingdom. There is considerable industry in the making of sugar, tobacco, silks and ribbons, candles, linen, cotton, and leather, and there are large iron foundries and machine shops. The water approaches to the city are in general rendered inaccessible by ice during three or four months every winter; but to remedy this defect it is proposed to build a new harbor at Nynas on the Baltic shore, thirty miles to the south. In spite of the winter drawback Stockholm is the seat of a trade sufficient to bring an average of 1,760 vessels of 635,000 tons into the port every year, carrying principally grain (wheat and rye), rice, flour, herrings, oils and oilcake, cork, groceries, metals, and wine and spirits (imports). The commodities exported consist chiefly of iron and steel, oats and tar. Though Stockholm was founded by Birger Jarl in 1255, it was not made the capital of Sweden till comparatively modern times. Since then, however, it has grown rapidly. Population, about 329,000.

St. Peter's, the Cathedral of Rome, the largest and one of the most magnificent churches in Christendom. It is a cruciform building in the Italian style, surmounted by a lofty dome, built on the legendary site of St. Peter's martyrdom; the foundation stone was laid on the 18th of April, 1506. Michael Angelo was appointed architect in 1546. He nearly completed the dome and a large portion of the building before his decease (1564). The nave was finished in 1612, the façade and portico in 1614, and the church was dedicated by Urban VIII., November 18, 1626. The interior diameter of the dome is 139 feet, the exterior diameter $195\frac{1}{2}$ feet; its height from the pavement to the base of the lantern, 405 feet; to the top of the cross outside, 448 feet. The length of the cathedral within the walls is $613\frac{1}{2}$ feet; the height of the nave near the door, $152\frac{1}{2}$ feet; the width, $87\frac{1}{2}$ feet. The width of the side aisles is $33\frac{3}{4}$ feet; the entire width of the nave and side aisles, including the piers that separate them, $197\frac{3}{4}$ feet. The circumference of the piers which support the dome is 253 feet. The floor of the cathedral covers nearly five acres. Its cost is estimated to have exceeded \$50,000,000.

St. Petersburg, the capital of the Russian Empire, at the head of the Gulf of Finland and the mouth of the Neva. When a strong wind is blowing from the sea its level rises by several feet, and the poorer parts of St. Petersburg are inundated every year; but when the overflow exceeds ten feet nearly the whole of the city is inundated. Peter I. laid the foundations of his capital in 1702 on one of the islands of the delta, and dreamed to make of it a new Amsterdam. The actual connection between Russia and its capital was established through the Neva, which since it was connected by canals with the upper Volga, became the real mouth of the immense basin of the chief river of Russia and its numberless tributaries. Foreign trade and the centralization of all administration in the residence of the emperor have made of St. Petersburg a populous city covering forty-two square miles. The Great Neva, the chief branch of the river, which has within the city itself a width of from 400 to 700 yards, is so deep that large ships can lie alongside its granite embankments. Cronstadt, built on an island sixteen miles to the west of St. Petersburg, is both the fortress and the port of the capital. Two-thirds of the foreign vessels unload within the city itself. The main body of the city, containing more than one-half of its inhabitants as well as all the chief streets, stands on the mainland, on the left bank of the Neva; and a beautiful granite quay, with a long series of palaces and mansions, stretches for two and one-half miles. Only two permanent bridges cross the Neva; the other two, built on boats, are removed in autumn and spring. The island Vasilievsky, between the Great and Little Nevas, has at its head the Stock Exchange, surrounded by spacious storehouses, and a row of scientific institutions, all facing the Neva. On the Peterburgsky Island, between the Little Neva and the Great Neva, stands the old fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul, facing the Winter Palace, and containing the mint and the cathedral. It has behind it the arsenal, and a series of wide streets bordered by small, mostly wooden houses, chiefly occupied by the poorer civil service functionaries. Farther up the mainland on the right bank of the Neva is covered by the poorer parts of the city, but contains some public buildings and a great number of factories. Numerous islands, separated from each other by small branches into which both Nevas subdivide, and connected together by a great number of wooden bridges, are covered with beautiful parks and summer houses, to which most of the wealthier and middle-class population repair in the summer. The main part of St. Petersburg has for its center the Old Admiralty. Near the Admiralty are the chief public buildings of the city. The principal churches (which are generally distinguished by prominent cupolas) are St. Isaac's Cathedral, the most costly of all, and one of the largest churches of Europe, modeled on St. Peter's, Rome, built of granite and Finland marble, and with a profusely decorated interior; the cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul, the resting-place of the emperors, with a conspicuous pyramidal spire (302 feet); the cathedral of Our Lady of Kazan, with an image of the Virgin enriched with precious stones and pearls; the Smolni Cathedral, a white marble edifice; and the Memorial Church, built on the spot where the Czar, Alexander II., was assassinated, one of the most splendid of the many sacred edifices in the city. Among the many palaces are the Winter Palace, now used only for ceremonial purposes, one of the largest and most luxurious in Europe; the Marble Palace, so-called; the Michael Palace, now used as the School of Military Engineers; and the Hermitage Palace, containing a fine library and one of the richest collections of French, Flemish, Dutch, Italian, Spanish, Russian, and other paintings, the private property of the czars, besides engravings, coins, gems, antiquities, etc. The cottage in which Peter the Great lived while superintending the construction of St. Petersburg is still preserved. Other buildings of importance are: the Admiralty, a vast parallelogram of brick, with a naval and natural history museum and library; the arsenal, containing a museum of artillery; the palaces of the general staff and of the senate; the custom-house, the exchange, and imperial bank; the fortress of Petropavlovsk (the Russian bastille); the Academy of Sciences, with extensive museum and library; and the imperial library, with over a million volumes and large collections of manuscripts and engravings. There are numerous hospitals and charitable institutions, a university, founded in 1819, many special academies, and four theaters maintained by the state. Of the monuments, the colossal equestrian statue of Peter the Great, erected by Catherine II. (1782), and the monolithic Doric column of granite, one hundred and fifty-five feet high, erected by Nicholas to the memory of Alexander I., take first rank.

St. Petersburg was founded by Peter the Great in 1703, when he had just wrested its site from the Swedes. The forced construction of a city in a site apparently forbidden by nature, cost the lives, according to various accounts, of from 100,000 to 200,000 peasants, collected from all parts of the Russian Empire. It was at first built entirely of wood, and without a proper street system, but the extensive fires of 1736 and 1737 facilitated the reconstruction on an improved plan. The Empress Elizabeth did much to improve the city; it is, however, chiefly indebted to Catherine II. for its regularity and architectural splendor; and the improvements under Nicholas and Alexander II. have made it one of the finest of European capitals. Population, 1,429,000.

Suez Canal, a great artificial channel cutting the isthmus of Suez, and thus forming a waterway between the Mediterranean and the Red Sea; was planned and undertaken by the French engineer Lesseps, through whose untiring efforts a company was formed and the necessary capital raised; occupied ten years in the construction (1859-69), and cost some twenty million pounds; from Port Said on the Mediterranean to Suez at the head of the Red Sea the length is about 100 miles, a portion of which lies through Lakes Menzaleh, Ballah, Timsah, and the Bitter Lakes; as widened and deepened in 1886 it has a minimum depth of twenty-eight feet, and varies from 150 to 300 feet in width; traffic is facilitated by electric light during the night, and the passage occupies little more than twenty-four hours; has been neutralized and exempted from blockade, vessels of all nations in peace or war being free to pass through; now the highway to India and the East, shortening the voyage to India by 7,600 miles; three-fourths of the ships passing through are English; an annual toll is drawn of close on three million pounds, the net profit of which falls to be divided amongst the shareholders, of whom, since 1875, the British Government has been one of the largest.

Superior, Lake, the extreme west and most extensive of the Great Lakes of North America, being the largest body of fresh water in the Western Hemisphere. Its length, east to west, is about 360 miles, with a mean breadth of about eighty miles, so that its area may be taken at about 31,500 square miles. The mean depth is estimated at 1,008 feet, and the height of its surface at about 602 feet above the Atlantic. It receives upward of fifty rivers, but none is of much importance except the St. Louis which enters at its southwest extremity, and the Riviere au Grand Portage. During the melting of the snow, these and the other rivers sweep into the lake vast quantities of sand, boulder stones, and drift timber. It discharges itself at its eastern extremity into Lakes Huron and Michigan, by the river and falls of St. Mary. This lake embosoms many large and well-wooded islands, the chief of which is Isle Royal. Toward each extremity the lake contracts in width, and at the lower end terminates in a bay which falls into the outlet, the St. Mary's River, at the two opposite headlands of Gros Cape on the north and Point Iroquois on the south. Thence to the mouth of the St. Mary's at Lake Huron is about sixty miles. The navigation of this river is interrupted twenty miles below its source at the Falls of St. Mary, or, as the place is commonly called, Sault Ste. Marie. Here the river descends in a succession of rapids extending three-fourths of a mile, from eighteen to twenty-one feet, the fall varying with the stage of the water in Lake Superior.

A ship canal has been constructed past the falls by the United States Government, so that now the lake is accessible to vessels from the Atlantic Ocean. The water of Lake Superior, remarkable for its coldness, purity, and transparency, is inhabited by many kinds of fish, among which are the delicious white fish and the gray trout.

Sweden (Swedish, Sverige), a kingdom of Northern Europe, comprising, with Norway and Lapland, the whole of the Scandinavian Peninsula, of which it forms the east, south, and most important portion; having northeast, Russian Finland; east and south, the Gulf of Bothnia and the Baltic; southwest, the Sound, Cattegat, and Skagerrack; and west and north, Norway, from which it is, for the most part, divided by the great mountain chain of Scandinavia. Length, north to south, 950 miles; average breadth about 190 miles; area, 172,876 square miles; population, estimated at 5,199,000. Capital, Stockholm.

Sweden is divided into three principal regions: Goethland (Gothia) in the south; Sweden proper, occupying the center; and Norland (by far the largest part), comprising the remainder. These three regions are again subdivided into twenty-four lans, or districts. Sweden is mountainous in the west, but, in general, flat; and it is remarkable that along the whole road, from Gottenburg in the west to Stockholm in the east, there is not a single acclivity of consequence till within a few miles of the latter.

The climate is less severe than might be expected in so high a latitude. The summers are hot, and spring is almost unknown. In the north snow covers the ground for five or six months in the year; and the west coasts are milder and more humid than the east.

The domestic animals are the same as those of North America. The others are hares and foxes, beavers, wolves, and, in the cold provinces of the north, bears, the leming, and the reindeer. Water fowl are abundant and the mosquitoes are as troublesome as they are in tropical countries.

Only about a fiftieth part of the country is cultivated. Agriculture is in a very backward state, but has been recently much improved. Apple, pear, and cherry trees grow but languidly; while berries of many different kinds are produced spontaneously and spread luxuriantly. Wheat succeeds only in the southern provinces; oats are raised more generally, and in larger quantities; but rye and barley are the kinds of grain most frequently met with. The manufacturing industries include those connected with iron, steel, wooden goods, woollens, cottons, silks, refined sugar, leather, paper, spirits, etc. The greater part of the trade is with Great Britain and Germany.

Switzerland, a west-central republic of Europe, bounded on the north by Baden, Württemberg, and Bavaria, east by the Tyrol, south by Italy, and west and northwest by France. Maximum length from east to west, 210 miles; breadth, 140 miles. This, the most mountainous country in Europe, has the Alps forming the whole of its southern and eastern frontiers, besides extending its ramified chains over the greater part of its interior. The most level tracts of surface are found in the northwestern cantons of Berne, Basle, and Zurich, where they form a series of mountain-locked vales, backed by the Jura Range on the French border. The chief valley is that of the Rhone in the south embracing the canton of Valais, with rich tillable tracts and fertile pastures extending on either hand towards the bases of the Bernese and Pennine Alps. The principal rivers, all rapid and unnavigable, are the Rhone, Rhine, Ticino, Reuss, Aar, etc., with their affluents. The Swiss lakes, notably numerous and picturesquely located, as well as of great depth, comprise those of Geneva, Constance, Lucerne, Neufchâtel, Zurich, Thun, Bienne, Wallenstadt, and Brienz. Forests cover about one-sixth of the entire surface of Switzerland. Agriculture is carried on chiefly in the valleys, where the cereals, along with flax, hemp, and tobacco, are raised. The mountain slopes, occupying fully two-fifths of the territorial area, afford excellent pasturage, and furnish dairy produce, tallow, hides, etc., in quantities enough for exportation. Fruits of the hardier varieties grow well and profitably. In the western cantons, the vine flourishes; while the orchards of the Thurgau and other northern districts supply ample material for the manufacture of cider, and of Kirschenwasser and other liquors. The national industry (other than rural) is largely developed in important manufactures, of which those of textile fabrics, leather goods, pottery, sugar, watches, jewelry, etc., constitute the staple items. The chief cities and towns are: Geneva, Zurich, Berne, the capital, Basle, Lausanne, La Chaux de Fonds, St. Gall, Lucerne, Neufchâtel, and Freiburg.

Taj Mahal, or Mehal ("Gem of Buildings"), a famous mausoleum, erected at Agra, India, by Shah Jehan for his favorite wife. It is 186 feet square with the corners cut off, the whole surmounted by a dome fifty-eight feet in diameter and about 210 feet in height, flanked by four octagonal kiosks. The interior is divided into four domed chambers in the corners, and a large central arcaded octagon, all connected by corridors. The central octagon contains two cenotaphs surrounded by a very noticeable openwork marble rail. The only light admitted enters through the delicately pierced marble screens of the windows. The decoration is especially noticeable for the stone mosaics of flower themes and arabesques, much of them in agate, jasper, and bloodstone. The entire structure stands on a white marble platform eighteen feet high and 313 feet square, with tapering cylindrical minarets 133 feet high at the corners. The whole Koran is said to be written in mosaics of precious stones on the interior walls. In the construction of this magnificent building, which, as Bayard Taylor says alone repays a visit to India, 20,000 men were employed twenty years. Although the labor cost nothing, over $20,000,000 were expended in its construction. The doors are of solid silver, and an enormous diamond was placed upon the tomb itself.

Thames, the most important river of Great Britain; usually said to rise about three miles southwest of Cirencester in Gloucestershire, near a bridge over the Thames and Severn Canal, called Thameshead Bridge, but is more properly formed by the Isis, Churn, Colne, and Leach, which have their sources on the east side of the Cotswold Hills, and unite near Lechlade. Its total course is estimated at 250 miles. Its tributaries include the Windrush, Cherwell, Thame, Colne, Brent, Lea, and Roding, on the left; the Kennet, Loddon, Wey, and Mole, on the right. Thameshead Bridge is 376 feet above sea level; the junction of the Colne above Lechlade is 243 feet. At London Bridge the width of the river is 266 yards, at Woolwich, 490 yards, at Gravesend, 800 yards, and three miles below, 1,290 yards. The depth of the river in the fair way above Greenwich to London Bridge is twelve to thirteen feet, while its tides have a mean range of seventeen feet and an extreme rise of twenty-two feet. By means of numerous canals immediate access is given from its basin to those of all the great rivers of England.

Thunder. The dazzling light emitted by the electric spark when it shoots from clouds charged with electricity is called lightning. In the lower regions of the atmosphere the light is white, but in the higher regions, where the air is more rarefied, it takes a violet tint; as does the spark of the electrical machine in a rarefied medium. The flashes of lightning are sometimes several leagues in length; they generally pass through the atmosphere in a zig-zag direction—a phenomenon ascribed to the resistance offered by the air condensed by the passage of a strong discharge. The spark then diverges from a right line, and takes the direction of least resistance. In vacuo electricity passes in a straight line. The sound which accompanies lightning is called thunder. It is due to the sudden disturbance of the air in the vicinity of the line in which the spark passes. It is generally a long rolling sound rising and falling in intensity. The duration of the thunder peal is generally attributed to the re-echoing of the sound produced at various places.

Tiber, a river of Italy celebrated in ancient Roman history, rises in the Apennines, in the province of Arezzo, Tuscany; rapid and turbid in its upper course, but navigable 100 miles upwards from its mouth; flows generally in a southern direction, and after a course of about 260 miles enters the Mediterranean about fifteen miles below Rome.

Tides, the rising and falling of the water of the sea, which occurs periodically, as observed at places on the coasts. The tide appears as a general wave of water, which gradually elevates itself to a certain height, then as gradually sinks till its surface is about as much below the medium level as it was before above it. From that time the wave again begins to rise; and this reciprocating motion of the waters continues constantly, with certain variations in the height and in the times of attaining the greatest degree of height and of depression. The alternate rising and falling of the tide-wave are observed to take place generally twice in the course of a lunar day, or of twenty-four hours, forty-nine minutes of mean solar time, on most of the shores of the ocean, and in the greater part of the bays, firths, and rivers which communicate freely with it. The tides form what are called a flood and an ebb, a high and low water. The whole interval between high and low water is often called a tide; the water is said to flow and to ebb; and the rising is called the flood-tide and the falling the ebb-tide. The rise or fall of the waters, in regard to elevation or depression, is exceedingly different at different places, and is also variable everywhere. The interval between two succeeding high-waters is also variable. It is shortest about new and full moon, being then about twelve hours, nineteen minutes; and about the time of the moon's quadratures it is twelve hours, thirty minutes. But these intervals are somewhat different at different places. Tides are caused by the attraction which the sun and moon exert over the water of the earth. The moon is the nearest of the heavenly bodies to the earth, and the mobile nature of water leads it to yield readily to the attractive influence. Those parts of the waters directly under the moon's vertical path in the heavens are drawn out towards the moon. At the same time the moon attracts the bulk of the earth, and, as it were, pulls the earth away from the water on the surface farthest from it, so that here also the water is raised, although not quite so much as on the nearer side. The waters being thus heaped up at the same time on these two opposite parts of the earth, and the waters situated half-way between them being thus necessarily depressed, two high and two low tides occur in the period of a little more than one revolution of the earth on its axis. The sun's influence upon the tides is evidenced in its either increasing or diminishing the lunar tide, according as the sun's place in the heavens coincides with the line of the moon's attraction, or the reverse. It is this difference which produces what are known as spring tides and neap tides. Spring tides occur at new and full moon, and are the result of the gravitating influence of both sun and moon; neap tides occur when the moon is in her quarters, and are not so high as the spring tides, the lunar influence being lessened by the sun's force acting in a direction at right angles to it. The interference of coasts and irregularities in the ocean beds cause the great variations as to time and range in the actual tides observed at different places. In some places, as in the German Ocean at a point north of the Straits of Dover, a high tide meets low water, and thus maintains perpetual mean tide. In the case cited, high water transmitted through the Straits of Dover encounters low water transmitted round the north of Scotland, and vice versa. The interval of time at any place between noon and the time of high water on the day of full or new moon is called the establishment of the port.

Tokyo, formerly called Yeddo, the capital of Japan, and chief residence of the Mikado; on a bay of the same name; on the southeast coast of Hondo, the largest of the Japanese Islands, and connected by rail with Yokohama and Kanagawa. The bulk of the houses are of wood, but there are many new buildings of brick and stone, and an imperial palace has been erected near the center, as also public offices, etc. The greater part of the town is flat, and intersected by numerous canals crossed by bridges. The streets are generally narrow and irregular. Gas and electricity have been introduced, and the sanitary arrangements have been improved. Education is well organized, and there are nearly 700 private and elementary schools. Tokyo contains the imperial university, and it may be considered the center of the political, commercial, and literary activity of Japan. Population, 1,839,788.

Toronto, capital of the province of Ontario, Canada; on Lake Ontario. Its site is low, but rises gently from the water's edge to a height of about 100 feet. The Bay of Toronto an arm of Lake Ontario, on the south of the city, affords a commodious and excellent harbor, capable of receiving the largest lake vessels. Toronto has various manufacturing interests, including several engineering plants and iron foundries, soap works, an immense distillery, a number of breweries, rolling mills, car shops, tanneries, carriage factories, machine shops, cabinet factories, spice mills, car wheel works, pork packing plants, boot and shoe establishments, sash and door, and sewing machine factories, etc. The city has large facilities for an extensive lake traffic. There is regular steamboat connection with all lake ports as well as with those on the St. Lawrence River, making the city one of great commercial importance. Toronto was founded in 1794 by Governor Simcoe. The town was captured in 1813 by the Americans under General Pike, who was killed during the attack. Since that period it has made steady progress as a commercial, educational, and residential center. Population, 262,149.

Turkey. In Europe it occupies a considerable portion of the Balkan peninsula, and in this portion is situated the capital, Constantinople, but the larger part of Turkey is in Asia. The immediate possessions of Turkey in Europe, extend from Montenegro, Bosnia, Servia, and Eastern Rumelia on the north to the Ægean and Greece on the south, and from the Black Sea to the Adriatic, the Straits of Otranto, and the Ionic Sea. In 1878 the area under Turkish rule was reduced, and the independence and the limits of several of the formerly tributary states extended. There are still nominally under Turkey the autonomous province of Eastern Rumelia; the island of Crete; the tributary principality of Bulgaria; the semi-detached provinces of Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Novi-bazar, administered by Austria-Hungary. A number of islands in the Ægean belong to Turkey. Egypt also is nominally part of the Turkish dominions. European Turkey is traversed in different directions by numerous mountain chains, but the main systems are the Balkan range, stretching from west to east between Bulgaria and Eastern Rumelia to Cape Emineh on the Black Sea; Rhodope, south of the Balkans; the Shardagh and Grammos on the west, continued northwest under various names into Bosnia and Herzegovina. The most important river basin is that which drains into the Archipelago or Ægean Sea, which receives the Vardar, the Struma, the Mista or Karasu, and the Maritza. There are several plains remarkable for their fertility and beauty. The climate is not so mild as its latitude might seem to indicate, the winter being severe; but the summer heat is excessive. For the production of the ordinary cereals no part of the world is more admirably adapted. The principal grains are maize, wheat, and barley, while rice, millet, and buckwheat, are produced, as also flax, hemp, sesame, and madder. The cultivation of tobacco and cotton is very general. Among fruits the figs are highly esteemed; the cultivation of the olive is carried on along the coasts of the Archipelago and the Adriatic; wine is an important product in many districts; and much attention is paid in some parts to the growing of roses. There are few manufactures except in Constantinople, Adrianople, and Salonica, and these are of little importance.

Turkey in Asia includes Anatolia, otherwise known as Asia Minor, the country intersected by the Euphrates and the Tigris, the mountainous region of Armenia between their upper courses and the Black Sea, the ancient lands of Syria and Palestine, and the coast strips of Arabia along the Red Sea and Persian Gulf. Omitting Arabia, the country consists mainly of: (1) a high plateau traversed by the mountains of Taurus and Anti-Taurus, and stretching from the Archipelago to the borders of Persia. (2) A plateau of less elevation and extent (Syria and Palestine) traversed by the double range of Lebanon. (3) The extensive plain of Mesopotamia on the lower Tigris and Euphrates. The islands Chios, Lesbos, Rhodes, etc., belong to Turkey in Asia, while the island of Samos is a tributary principality, and Cyprus is held by Great Britain. The chief towns in Asiatic Turkey are Smyrna, Damascus, Bagdad, Aleppo, and Beyrout. The chief exports are raisins, figs, and dates, silk, cotton, wool, and mohair, opium, coffee, wheat, wine, valonia, olive oil, and tobacco; while the imports are cotton, woolen, and silk goods, metals, iron, steel, glass wares, etc. The inhabitants of the Ottoman Empire are of very diverse races. First in order are the Osmanli Turks, who, as the dominant race, are diffused over the country. The Greeks form the bulk of the population over great part of the Ægean coasts and islands. Aronauts, or Albanians, are found in the west throughout Albania; the northwest is occupied by Servians; and Bulgarians inhabit the district south of the Danube and east of Servia and Albania. In Asiatic Turkey the Turks are an important element, but there are also numbers of Armenians, Arabs, Kurds, Jews, Greeks, Circassians, etc.

Ural Mountains. Form part of the boundary between Europe and Asia, and separate European Russia on the west from Siberia on the east. The chain extends south from the Kara Sea, an arm of the Arctic Ocean, to the middle course of the Ural River, and is 1,333 miles long, with a width varying from sixteen to sixty-six miles. Although the Ural Mountains form really a single uninterrupted chain, geographers have agreed to consider them as divided into three sections — the North, Middle, and South Ural. The Middle Ural, commonly called Roudnoi (metalliferous), the principal seat of the mineral riches of the whole chain, comprises the highest peaks, as the Kanjakovski Kamen, rising to 5,000 feet. The chain is composed chiefly of crystalline and metamorphic rocks, granite, gneiss, porphyry, chloritic and micaceous schists. The Ural Mountains, especially the middle and the north part of the South Ural (the governments of Perm and Orenburg), abound in mines of gold, platinum, copper, and iron. Among the precious stones the most notable are the emerald, amethyst, and diamond.

Vatican, The, the palace of the pope in Rome and one of the largest in the world; contains a valuable collection of works of art, and is one of the chief attractions in the city; it is a storehouse of literary treasures as well and documents of interest bearing on the history of the Middle Ages.

Venice (Italian, Venezia), a city of Italy, the capital of a province of the same name, on the Gulf of Venice, about 155 miles east of Milan. The city is built on a number of low islands, chiefly upon the island of Rialto, and is intersected by numerous canals. Many of the palaces and other public buildings of the city are very fine, especially the Cathedral of St. Mark, dating from the Eleventh Century, which is remarkable for its five cupolas, its five hundred marble columns, and its rich mosaics; and the palace of the Doges, built in the Fourteenth Century, and now used for ceremonies of state. From the palace of the Doges to the prisons on the opposite side of the canal called the Rio Palazzo stretches the famous Bridge of Sighs; and at some distance in front of the cathedral stands the also famous campanile, or bell tower, of St. Mark, which was first completed in the Sixteenth Century, and again rebuilt in 1904–09, after its collapse in 1902, due to the giving way of the artificial foundation. Population, 151,840.

Vesuvius, Mount (ve-soo'veūs). A famous volcano of South Italy, six miles east of Naples. Its base commands a circuit of thirty miles; its height is 4,260 feet above sea level; and its crater, 350 feet in depth, has a circumference of two miles at its outer place, with a level plain at the bottom a half mile in diameter. It towers above a smiling pastoral country dotted with towns and vineyards, and which has time after time been the scene of its devastating eruptions. The earliest known of the latter occurred in 79 A. D., when the cities of Pompeii, Herculaneum, and Stabiae were overwhelmed beneath the floods of lava it disgorged. The most remarkable of later eruptions have been those of 1036, 1779, 1822, 1839, 1855, and 1872. On the last-named occasion the volcano continued for some days in a state of ebullition, and during its continuance made considerable ravages upon immediately surrounding life and property.

Victoria Nyanza, a lake in East Central Africa, on the equator, almost equally divided between British East Africa and German East Africa, at an elevation of 3,300 feet above the sea level; discovered by Captain Speke in 1858, and circumnavigated by Stanley in 1875; is regarded as the head-source of the Nile, the waters of it flowing through Albert Nyanza eighty miles to the north, between which two lakes lies the territory of Uganda.

Vienna (German, Wien), the capital of the Austrian Empire, situated on the right bank of the Danube, in a small plain at the foot of the Wiener Wald. It is divided into an old and a new town, the former occupying a small semicircle near the Danube, and being still, notwithstanding that its streets are narrow and often crooked, the seat of the court and the center of fashionable life. Round this portion of the city (which contains, besides the Imperial palace, the magnificent Gothic cathedral of St. Stephen, and the university, founded in 1635) is a zone 1,300 feet in breadth, known as the Ring. This space was formerly occupied by fortifications, but it is now laid out in boulevards, with palaces and other noble buildings. It is separated from the old town by the Ringstrasse, which is more than two miles long, nearly two hundred feet wide, and bordered on both sides by trees. The new part of the city contains many handsome edifices. To the southwest is the castle of Schönbrunn, the summer palace of the emperor, surrounded by a large and admirably laid-out garden; and there are several other fine palatial residences in the same quarter of the city. Altogether, the city has a circumference of sixteen miles. It has large manufactures of silk-stuffs, as well as of meerschaum pipes and other fancy articles, and does a very considerable trade in grain. In fact, Vienna is the great emporium of the western province of Austria. It is an ancient town, and was a place of importance even in Roman times, when it bore the name of Vindobona. In modern history it is celebrated as the scene of numerous congresses, notably of that generally known as the Congress of Vienna (1814-15), for the rearrangement of the affairs of Europe after the abdication of the Emperor Napoleon. During the revolution of 1848 the city was held for a short time by the insurgents, and was bombarded. Population, 1,856,949.

Volga, the most important river of Russia, and the longest in Europe, has its origin in a marshy plain among the Valdai Hills, in the government of Tver. Its source is 550 feet above ordinary sea level and 633 above the Caspian; its length, 2,300 miles.

Wales, a principality in the southwest of the island of Great Britain, which, since Edward I., gives the title of Prince of Wales to the heir-apparent of the British Crown; area, 7,470 square miles; population included in that of England. It is divided into twelve counties. As a whole it is very mountainous, particularly in the north, where Snowdon, the culminating point of South Britain, rises to the height of 3,571 feet; and it is intersected by beautiful valleys, traversed by numerous streams, including, among others, the large River Severn. It is rich in minerals, particularly coal, iron, copper, and even gold, and to these Wales owes its chief wealth. The coal trade is most extensive, and Cardiff is the largest coal port in the world. In 1898 about 24,000,000 tons of coal were produced in Wales. Iron, steel, and copper works are also on a large scale. Besides the mineral industries, there are considerable woolen manufactures, especially of flannel, coarse cloth, and hosiery. The Welsh have many strange customs and peculiar superstitions. They are remarkably fond of poetry and music, and their language is said to be peculiarly adapted to poetical effusions. Their ancient language is, however, falling fast into disuse throughout the principality, more especially the southern part. Family distinction is held in great estimation. The aboriginal Celtic race still inhabits some parts of the country. Llewellyn ap Gryffydd was the last prince who exerted himself for the independence of Wales. In 1282 he was subdued by Edward I., and fell on the field of battle. From that time Wales has been annexed to the English Crown; but the union was not complete till the reign of Henry VIII., when the government and laws were assimilated with those of England.

Warsaw, the chief city of Russian Poland, and the capital of the Kingdom of Poland from towards the close of the Sixteenth Century to the final partition of the kingdom in 1795. It is situated on the left bank of the Vistula, about 320 miles east of Berlin. It possesses a cathedral which dates from the Thirteenth Century, and a large number of palaces and other imposing buildings, situated in broad and handsome squares; but for the most part the city is irregularly built and of indifferent appearance, the chief modern buildings being in the suburbs, with one of which, Praga, on the opposite side of the Vistula, the city is connected by a bridge of boats. The whole city is defended, or rather overawed, by a vast citadel, erected by the Russians, under the Emperor Nicholas. Warsaw is the residence of an archbishop, who is primate of Poland. Its university, founded in 1816, was suppressed after the insurrection of 1830, but was reopened in 1864. The city is the principal seat of both the manufactures and the trade of Poland. Its annual fairs are much frequented, and it carries on a large commercial intercourse, not only with Cracow and Dantzic by the Vistula, but with St. Petersburg and Vienna by rail. Population, 756,426.

Washington, capital of the United States; population, 340,000; in the District of Columbia; at the confluence of the Potomac and the Anacostia, or East Branch, Rivers, and on the Pennsylvania, the Baltimore & Ohio, the Southern, the Chesapeake & Ohio, and the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac railroads; 136 miles southwest of Philadelphia; 226 miles southwest of New York; forty miles southwest of Baltimore, and 185 miles west of the Atlantic Ocean. The site of the city is an admirable one, surrounded by a circle of hills and comprising a rolling plain, with here and there irregular eminences which provide beautiful and advantageous positions for the various public buildings. The city was laid out expressly for the National Capital and on a scale indicating that it was expected to grow into a vast metropolis. The United States and the District of Columbia own an extensive waterworks system, costing $10,000,000. The reservoirs have a storage capacity of 76,000,000 gallons, and the water is distributed through 381 miles of mains. The consumption averages 55,000,000 gallons a day. There are in all 320 miles of streets, of which 266 miles are paved. The streets of Washington are irregularly laid out, being from seventy to 160 feet wide. Pennsylvania Avenue is the principal street of the city, having on or near it many of the leading hotels, theaters, stores, etc. F street is the next business street in importance. The sewer system covers 418 miles. The streets are lighted by gas and electricity at an annual cost of about $250,000. The average cost of the police department exceeds $743,500 per annum, and that of the fire department $185,000. The annual cost for the maintenance of the city government is over $9,052,000. The annual death rate averages 21.82 per 1,000.

The city contains many magnificent structures. The Capitol, crowning Capitol Hill, is one of the most beautiful public edifices in the world. It is built in pure classic style, with two immense wings of white marble, extending from a central structure constructed of light yellow freestone, painted white. The main front facing east is beautified with three splendid porticoes adorned by Corinthian pillars. The central portico contains noted groups of statuary, and on the esplanade immediately in front stands Greenough's famous colossal statue of Washington. The entrance to the rotunda is by the celebrated bronze door, designed by Randolph Rogers and made by Von Muller in Munich. It is seventeen feet high by nine feet wide, and cost $28,000. The relief work on the door commemorates the discovery of America by Columbus. The walls of the interior of the rotunda, which is 180 feet high and ninety-six feet in diameter, are ornamented with eight panels containing paintings of scenes in American history. America is depicted with Indian and eagle, standing with History, who records on her tablet the progress of events. The canopy overhanging the eye of the dome, at a height of 180 feet above the rotunda floor, is 65 feet in diameter, and gives a field of 4,640 square feet for Brumidi's allegorical fresco. The lofty central dome of iron is surmounted by a statue of liberty, giving a total height to the capitol of 307½ feet. The structure covers three and one-half acres, and cost over $13,000,000. It accommodates the two Houses of Congress, United States Supreme Court, and until recently also held the Library of Congress.

The new Congressional Library is built just east of the capitol, in a square comprising about ten acres. It is three stories high, 470 feet long by 340 wide, is constructed of white New Hampshire granite in the Italian Renaissance style, and cost $6,347,000. The building contains an octagonal reading room, 100 feet in diameter. There are many magnificently carved marble arches. The library is constructed around four spacious inner courts and in all has over 2,000 windows, which make it the best-lighted building of its kind in the world. Besides the reading room, there are a lecture hall, copyright record rooms, a large art gallery, a map room, etc. The whole library could be made to accommodate 6,000,000 volumes. It is now the third library in point of size in the world, and, in the beginning of 1908, contained 1,434,000 books and pamphlets, and some 900,000 other articles.

The United States Treasury building is one and one-fourth miles west of the capitol. It is constructed of granite in the Ionic style, and cost $6,000,000. It is three stories high and 468 feet long by 264 wide. An Ionic colonnade, modeled after the Temple of Minerva in Athens, is built on the east front. On the west front is a magnificent central entrance with eight colossal monolithic columns. There are in all about 200 rooms, including the cash room, which is finished with rich marble and occupies two stories; the gold room, containing millions of dollars in gold coin; the Redemption Division; counterfeit room, etc. All of the United States notes, bonds, etc., are made here.

The building of the State, War, and Navy Departments is one of the largest public edifices in Washington. It is built of granite in the Roman Doric style, is four stories high, 567 feet long by 342 feet wide, covers four and one-half acres, and cost $11,000,000. In the north and east wings are the War and Navy Departments; in the south portion is the State Department. The building contains in all 566 rooms, including the Hall of the Secretary of State, the Ambassador's Room, and the library with 60,000 volumes. In the latter apartment the Declaration of Independence is preserved.

The building of the Patent Office, also known as the Department of the Interior, is located in the central part of the city. It is 453 feet long by 351 feet wide, and is constructed of granite, marble, and freestone, in the Doric style. The main entrance faces F Street, and is reached by a broad stairway of granite steps. The portico has sixteen enormous Doric columns supporting a classic pediment. The building contains besides offices and other rooms, the model room, in which there are great numbers of models, representing every department of mechanical art. The length of the floor in the latter room is 1,350 feet, or over one-fourth of a mile. The offices of the Secretary of the Interior, of the Commissioner of Patents, and of the Indian Bureau are on the second floor.

The building of the Land Office, formerly occupied by the Post-office Department, and costing $1,700,000, is of white marble, in the Italian or modified Corinthian style, and is 300 feet long by 204 feet wide. It is three stories high, and on the Eighth Street side has sculptures illustrating the telegraph and railroad.

The Pension building is constructed in the Renaissance style. It borders on Judiciary Square, covers 80,000 square feet, is seventy-five feet high, and 400 feet long by 200 feet wide. On the exterior and on a level with the second floor is a notable band of sculpture in terra-cotta, three feet in height, and 1,200 feet in length. It represents an army in campaign, supported by sailors and boats of the navy.

The Smithsonian Institution is a magnificent structure, erected of red sandstone in the Romanesque style. It is 477 feet long by 150 feet wide, and has nine towers from seventy-five to 150 feet in height. It was established by James Smithson. The remaining noteworthy buildings include the Bureau of Education, Department of Agriculture, Army Medical Museum and Library, building of the Commission of Fish and Fisheries, the United States Naval Observatory, Executive Mansion or "White House," a National Soldiers' Home, etc. The buildings of note not belonging to the government include the Corcoran Gallery of Art, the Masonic Temple, Odd Fellows' Hall, "Evening Star" building, the "Baltimore Sun" building, Washington Market, the court house, New Willard, Raleigh, Shoreham, Arlington, and Gordon hotels, and the Cosmos, Army and Navy, Washington, and Metropolitan clubs.

Monuments.—These include the Washington Monument, the Naval Monument, in honor of the officers, sailors and marines who were killed in the Civil War, the Lafayette Monument, with statues of Lafayette, Rochambeau, D'Estaing, De Grasse, and Duportail, statues of Washington, Franklin, Webster, two of Lincoln, General Rawlins, Admiral Farragut, Martin Luther, Admiral Dupont, President Garfield, and Chief-Justice Marshal; and equestrian statues of General Winfield Scott, Nathaniel Greene, George H. Thomas, W. S. Hancock, John B. McPherson, and Andrew Jackson.

Education.—The city has 125 buildings used for school purposes. The white and negro pupils are provided with separate schools. The institutions for higher education are the George Washington University, Howard University, Galaudet College, Georgetown University, the Catholic University of America, Gonzaga College, American University, National University Law and Medical Schools. The centennial of Washington was fitly celebrated December 12, 1900.

Washington Monument, a magnificent monument erected by the American people, in honor of George Washington. It stands in the Mall, a public park on the banks of the Potomac and Tiber Creek, Washington, D. C. The corner stone was laid by President Polk, July 4, 1848, and December 6, 1884, the cap stone was set in position. The foundations are 126½ feet square and 36 feet 8 inches deep. The base of the monument is 55 feet 1½ inches square, and the walls 15 feet ¼ inch thick. At the 500 foot mark, where the pyramidal top begins, the shaft is 34 feet 5½ inches square and the walls are 18 inches thick. The monument is made of blocks of marble two feet thick, and it is said there are over 18,000 of them. The height above the ground is 555 feet. The pyramidal top terminates in an aluminum tip, which is 9 inches high and weighs 100 ounces. The mean pressure of the monument is five tons per square foot, and the total weight, foundation and all, is nearly 81,000 tons. The door at the base, facing the capitol, is 8 feet wide and 16 feet high, and enters a room 25 feet square. An immense iron framework supports the machinery of the elevator, which is hoisted with steel wire ropes 2 inches thick. At one side begins the stairs, of which there are 50 flights, containing 18 steps each. Five hundred and twenty feet from the base there are 8 windows, 18 x 24 inches, two on each face. The area at the base of the pyramidal top is 1,187¼ feet, space enough for a six-room house, each room to be 12 x 16 feet. The Washington Monument is the highest monument in the world; total cost, $1,500,000.

Wellington, a city and capital of New Zealand; on Port Nicholson, an islet of Cook's Strait; on the southwest extremity of the provincial district of Wellington, North Island. Its harbor is six miles long and five wide. The provincial district of Wellington has an area of 11,003 square miles. It has an equable and healthy climate, but is subject to earthquake shocks. It is intersected by several mountain ranges, but there are many fine agricultural and pastoral districts. Gold was found in 1881. Population, 63,807.

Westminster Abbey, the coronation church of the sovereigns of England, and one of the chief ornaments of London. It is a magnificent Gothic pile, situated near the Thames, and adjoining the Houses of Parliament. In 1065 a church was built here in the Norman style by Edward the Confessor. Part of this structure still remains in the pyx house and the south side of the cloisters; but the main building, as it now stands, was begun in 1220 by Henry III., and was practically completed by Edward I. Various additions, however, were made, down to the time of Henry VII., who built the chapel which bears his name.

The extreme length of the church, including Henry VII.'s chapel, is 531 feet; breadth of transepts, 203 feet; height of roof, 102 feet; height of tower, 225 feet. The coronation ceremony takes place in the choir, where the coronation stone brought by Edward I. from Scotland is situated beside the coronation chairs of the English sovereigns. Westminster Abbey is distinguished as the burial place of a large number of English kings from Edward the Confessor to George II.; the north transept is occupied chiefly by monuments to warriors and statesmen; while in the south transept is situated the "Poet's Corner," the burial and memorial place of most of England's great writers from Chaucer to John Ruskin.

Westminster Hall, the hall of the old palace of Westminster, was erected by Richard II. (1397-99) on the foundations of a structure built by William Rufus. It has a fine porch, and its hammer-beam roof of carved timber is considered the most notable of its kind; length of the building, 290 feet, breadth 68 feet, and height 110 feet. This building is closely associated with many stirring events in English history; but it is chiefly remarkable as the place where were held such great state trials as those of the Chancellor More, Lady Jane Grey, the Earl of Strafford, King Charles I., and Warren Hastings, and as the center of the highest English courts of law till these were removed to the new buildings recently erected for their accommodation. The hall now serves as a fine vestibule to the Houses of Parliament.

Westphalia, the name given at different periods to (1) one of the circles of the old German Empire, (2) one of Napoleon's kingdoms (1807-13), conferred upon his brother Jerome; and (3) now to a province of Prussia. The latter is bounded by Rhenish Prussia, Holland, Hanover, Brunswick, Hesse, and Nassau. Its area is 7771 square miles. The surface in the south and northeast is generally mountainous; the northwest spreads out into extensive and often marshy plains, and belongs to the basin of the Ems; the northeast and a small part of the east to the basin of the Weser; the remainder, constituting the far larger portion of the whole, belongs to the basin of the Rhine, whose chief tributaries are the Ruhr and Lippe. Besides iron and coal in abundance the minerals include copper, lead, zinc, and salt; and the manufactures are varied and important. The province is divided into the three governments of Münster, Minden, and Arnsberg. Münster is the capital.

Wind. The movement of the air in currents from one place to another. Speaking generally, all winds are caused by the variations taking place continually in the condition of the air as respects heat and moisture, and, therefore, as respects rarity. When the air over a given place becomes rarefied, that is, when the atmospheric pressure there becomes relatively small, that region at once becomes a center towards which inflowing air-currents direct themselves. According to the nature, extent, and continuance of this diminution of pressure, the nature of the resulting air-currents varies within very wide limits. The causes which produce storms, tempests, hurricanes, etc., are very obscure. It is difficult to arrive at general laws regarding them, since it is not easy to obtain an exact knowledge of the various circumstances which accompany them. Storms are violent and destructive in the torrid zone; they are comparatively insignificant in temperate, and are scarcely known in polar regions. It was formerly supposed that a storm was merely a wind blowing in a certain direction at the rate of 100 or 120 miles an hour; but it has been recently found to be far more complicated in its nature. There is reason to believe that, in the northern hemisphere, the great body of the storm whirls in an horizontal circuit round a vertical or somewhat inclined axis of rotation which is carried forward with it; and that to a spectator placed in the center the rotation is always from right to left. Storms travel in a direction differing from the actual movement of the wind at the time. When the storm progresses westward the wind, at the commencement, is from a northern quarter, and towards the end from a southern. When the progressive motion is eastward, the phenomena are reversed; southern storms are subject to the same modification as northern, but in a reversed order. In all latitudes, the barometer sinks during the first half of the storm, in every part of its track; and rises during the second.

Yang-tse-kiang (yäng'-tse-kē-äng'), one of the two great rivers of China, is formed by two streams rising in Eastern Tibet, and after flowing east and then south enters the Chinese province of Yunnan. Pursuing a very tortuous course, much of it through most fertile and densely-populated regions, it reaches the great city of Nanking, 200 miles from the sea, where it widens gradually into the vast estuary which connects it with the Yellow Sea. Its whole course, under various names, is 3,000 miles, and the area of its basin is computed to be 548,000 square miles. It is connected by the Grand Canal with the Hoang-ho or Yellow River, and is navigable for vessels of considerable draught for 1,200 miles from its mouth. By the treaty of Tien-tsin the Lower Yang-tse was opened to European trade; and 700 miles from its mouth is the treaty-port of Hangkow, the great commercial port of Mid-China. The highest port on the river at present open to foreign trade is Ichang, 1,000 miles from its mouth.

Yarmouth, or, as it is more strictly called, Great Yarmouth, an English sea-port, important fishing-station, watering-place, and municipal and parliamentary borough, in the county of Norfolk, twenty miles east of Norwich. It is situated on a large and narrow tongue of land running from north to southward between the German Ocean and the estuary of the Yare. The town is connected by a bridge with Little Yarmouth, or South Town, in Suffolk. Along the sea frontage stretches a promenade and carriage-drive for three miles, with two piers. Parallel with the north and south quays, extending for nearly a mile and a quarter, are the principal streets, crossed by numerous narrow lanes called "rows." The parish church of St. Nicholas, founded in 1101, and of late years completely restored, is one of the largest in the kingdom. Yarmouth has a naval lunatic asylum, the only one in the kingdom. It is the great seat of the English herring and mackerel fishery, and also furnishes large quantities of white-fish. The curing of herring as "Yarmouth bloaters" is an important industry. The coast is dangerous, but Yarmouth Roads, between the shore and a range of sandbanks, offers a safe anchorage. Population, 51,250.

Yellow Sea (Chinese, Whang-hai), an arm of the Pacific Ocean, on the northeast coast of China; length, about 620 miles; greatest breadth, about 400 miles. It is very shallow, and obtains its name from the lemon yellow color of its water near the land, caused by mud suspended in the water from the inflow of the Rivers Hoang-ho and Yang-tse-kiang.

Yellowstone National Park, a region mainly in Wyoming, United States, which in 1872 was withdrawn from settlement by the United States Government to become a park or tract for the recreation of the people. Its area, as fixed by Act of Congress in 1892, is about 5,000 square miles. It is readily accessible by a branch of the Northern Pacific Railway. Its surface is mainly an undulating plain, diversified, however, by great mountain ranges, one of which, the Absaraka, a range separating the waters of the Yellowstone River (which see) from those of the Big Horn, contains some of the grandest scenery in the United States. The whole region exhibits an endless variety of wild volcanic scenery — hot springs, mud volcanoes, geysers, cañons, waterfalls, etc. The geysers are more remarkable than those of Iceland, and the Grand Geyser in Firehole Basin is the most magnificent natural fountain in the world. The Yellowstone Lake, one of many, is a magnificent sheet of water, with an area of 150 square miles. A large part of the park is covered with forest. Stringent legislation protects the game, with the result that elk, deer, antelope, bear, and bison have taken refuge in it.

Yokohama, the chief port of entry in Japan, and the headquarters of foreign shipping companies, banks, consulates, and commerce generally. Yokohama is a poorly-laid-out town with narrow, winding streets. The Bluff, however, conceded for residence in 1867, is a beautiful spot, commanding fine views of Fuji-san and of Yokohama Bay. The bay is beautiful. Work on a large harbor was carried out in 1889–1896; it is enclosed by two breakwaters one and one-fourth miles long, and an iron pier, 1,900 feet long. The foreign community here is the largest in the country. Silk represents three-fifths of the exports, the rest being other tissues, tea, rice, copper, curios, etc.; the imports are cottons and woollens, raw sugar, oils, metals, chemicals, arms, and ammunition, watches, etc. The annual exports from Yokohama are valued at $33,000,000, the imports at $27,000,000. Population, 326,000.

York (British, Caer Eborac, or Eborac; Latin, Eborācum), a cathedral city and archbishop's see, a municipal and parliamentary borough, and capital of Yorkshire, 188 miles north of London by rail, is situated at the confluence of the Foss and the Ouse. The city proper, embracing a circuit of nearly three miles, was inclosed by walls, restored by Edward I., the portions of which still remaining have been converted into promenades, commanding a prospect of the surrounding country. There are many quaint, old-fashioned houses in the narrow streets of its older portion. The great object of attraction, however, is the minster or cathedral, the finest in England. York was the capital of Roman Britain. It was made an archiepiscopal see by Edwin of Northumbria in 624. It still ranks second among English cities, its archbishop having the title of Primate of England, and its chief magistrate takes the title of Lord-mayor. It was incorporated by Henry I., and the city boundaries were extended in 1884. The trade is local, and the industries unimportant. Population, 77,793.

York Minster, one of the chief English cathedrals, was erected at different periods, and on the site of former buildings. The first Christian church erected here, which appears to have been preceded by a Roman temple, was built by Edwin, King of Northumbria, of wood, in 625, and of stone about 635. It was damaged by fire in 741, and was rebuilt by Archbishop Albert about 780. It was again destroyed by fire in the year 1069, and rebuilt by Archbishop Thomas. It was once more burnt down in 1137, with St. Mary's Abbey, and thirty-nine parish churches in York. Archbishop Roger began to build the choir in 1171; Walter Gray added the south transept in 1227; John de Romaine, the treasurer of the cathedral, built the north transept in 1260. His son, the archbishop, laid the foundation of the nave in 1291. In 1330, William de Melton built the two western towers, which were finished by John de Birmingham in 1342. Archbishop Thoresby, in 1361, began to rebuild the choir, in accordance with the magnificence of the nave, and he also rebuilt the lantern tower. Thus, by many hands, and many contributions of multitudes on the promise of indulgences, this magnificent fabric was completed. It was first set on fire by Jonathan Martin, a lunatic, and the roof of the choir and its internal fittings destroyed, February 2, 1829; the damage, estimated at $300,000, was repaired in 1832. An accidental fire broke out, which in one hour reduced the belfry to a shell, destroyed the roof of the nave, and much damaged the edifice, May 20, 1840.

Yo-Semite (yō-sem'i-te) Valley, one of the greatest natural wonders of North America, is in Mariposa County, California, about 140 miles southeast of San Francisco and midway between the eastern and western bases of the Sierra Nevada. It is a narrow valley at an elevation of 4,000 feet above the sea, and is itself nearly level, about six miles in length, and varying in width from one-half mile to a mile. On each side rise enormous domes and almost vertical cliffs of granite, one of them called the Half Dome, being 4,737 feet higher than the River Merced at its base, while the more important waterfalls are the Yosemite and the Bridal Veil. This valley has been added by Congress to the State of California, on condition that it shall be kept as a public park or free domain "inalienable for all time."

Yukon, a great river of Alaska, rises in British territory, and, after a course of 2,000 miles, falls, by a number of mouths forming a delta, into the Bering Sea; it is navigable nearly throughout, and its waters swarm with salmon three months in the year, some of them from eighty to 120 pounds in weight, and from five to six feet long.

Zambezi, one of the four great African rivers, and the fourth largest as regards both the volume of its waters and the area it drains, the other three being the Nile, the Congo, and the Niger; its head streams being the Lungebungo, the Leeba, and Leeambye. It waters a rich pastoral region, and it falls into the Indian Ocean after a course of nearly 1,800 miles, in which it drains 600,000 square miles of territory, or an area three times larger than that of France. Owing to cataracts and rapids it is only navigable in different stretches. At 900 miles from its mouth it plunges in a cataract known as the Victoria Falls, and which rivals in grandeur those even of Niagara.

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

LINCOLN'S CABINET

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Abyssinia. The system of government is monarchical, and each large province is under a Ras or feudal chief, the more important of whom form a Council of State, while under them are the governors of districts and the chiefs of villages. In October, 1907, a decree was issued announcing the formation of a cabinet on European lines, and ministers of justice, finance, commerce, war, and foreign affairs were appointed. Each Ras has a standing force as garrison and at call in case of war, and a considerable number of retainers not embodied. The forces united are estimated at 100,000 men.

Afghanistan. The government of Afghanistan is monarchical under one hereditary prince, called the Ameer, whose power varies with his own character and fortune. The dominions are politically divided into the four provinces of Kabul, Turkistan, Herat, and Kandahar, Badakhshan being now under Turkistan. Each province is under a hákim or governor (called Náib), under whom nobles dispense justice after a feudal fashion. Spoliation, exaction, and embezzlement are almost universal. The Ameer has a subsidy of eighteen lakhs (£120,000) per annum from the Indian Government. By the treaty of 1893, confirmed in 1905, the Ameer accepts the advice of the British Government in regard to his relations with foreign powers, and is guaranteed against unprovoked aggression on his dominions. A standing army is maintained, and service is obligatory, but rests lightly upon the population, about one man in eight being called upon to serve. The army comprises about 27,000 infantry, 7,000 cavalry, and a strong force of artillery, apart from the irregulars, who number some 25,000 mounted men and a smaller force of infantry, capable of being increased on a war footing to 80,000 horse and 60,000 foot.

Alabama was organized as a Territory in 1817, and admitted into the Union as a State in 1819. The Legislature consists of a Senate of thirty-five members and a House of Representatives of seventy members; senators are elected for four years; representatives for two. The chief executive officer of the State is the governor, elected for four years. He is commander-in-chief of the militia, has a limited veto in legislation, and exercises the powers usually entrusted to State governors. Other elective officers are the lieutenant-governor, auditor, attorney-general, treasurer, and superintendent of education.

Argentine Republic. The Constitution of the Argentine Republic bears date May 15, 1853, with modifications in 1862. By its provisions, the executive power is left to a president, elected for six years by representatives of the fourteen provinces, equal to double the number of senators and deputies combined; while the legislative authority is vested in a national congress, consisting of a senate and a house of deputies, the former numbering thirty, two from the capital and from each province, elected by a special body of electors in the capital, and by the legislatures in the provinces; and the latter, 120 members elected by the people. By the constitution there should be one deputy for every 33,000 inhabitants. A deputy must be 25 years of age, and have been a citizen for four years. The deputies are elected for four years, but one-half of the house must retire every two years. Senators must be 30 years of age, have been citizens for six years. One-third of the senate is renewed every three years. The two chambers meet annually from May 1st to September 30th. The members of both the senate and the house of deputies are paid for their services, each receiving 12,000 pesos per annum (about 1,060 lire). A vice-president, elected in the same manner and at the same time as the president, fills the office of chairman of the senate, but has otherwise no political power. The president is commander-in-chief of the troops, and appoints to all civil, military, and judicial offices, and has the right of presentation to bishoprics; he is responsible with the ministry for the acts of the executive; both president and vice-president must be Roman Catholics, Argentine by birth, and cannot be re-elected.

Arizona was organized as a Territory in 1863. Legislative authority is vested in a Legislative Assembly consisting of a council of twelve and a House of Representatives of twenty-four members elected by the people for two years. Acts are passed as in the States, but are subject to limitations by Congress. The Territory is represented in the Federal House of Representatives by a delegate who is elected every two years by the people, and exercises all functions of a representative except that of voting. The executive authority is vested in a governor appointed for four years, with the advice and consent of the United States Senate, by the President. He is commander-in-chief of the militia. He has a veto in legislation but its exercise may be overridden by a two-thirds vote of both houses. He has the power to summon extra sessions of the Legislature, but his reasons for doing so must first have been submitted to and approved by the President. The President appoints the secretary of state who, in case of the governor's absence or disqualification, takes the place of acting governor. Other officials are auditor, treasurer, attorney-general, and superintendent of public instruction.

Arkansas. The Constitution of 1836 was followed by those of 1864, 1868, and 1874; the last-named, amended five times from 1885 to 1902, is still in force. Amendments proposed in either house of the Legislature, approved by a majority of the members of each house and by a "majority voting at the said election" in the prescribed manner, became part of the Constitution. Legislative power is vested in the General Assembly, consisting of a Senate of thirty-five members, elected for four years, partially renewed every two years, and a House of Representatives of 100 members elected for two years. Any bill may originate in either house. The House of Representatives has the right to impeach; the Senate tries cases of impeachment. Senators and Representatives must be citizens, the former 25 years of age and the latter 21, and both must have resided in the State two years, and in the county or district one year next before election. The chief executive officer of the State is the governor, elected for two years. He is commander-in-chief of the militia; he can appoint to executive offices which have become vacant, has unlimited pardoning power (but not in cases of impeachment), and may call special sessions of the Legislature. He has a veto which may be overridden by a two-thirds majority of the members of each house. Other officials elected for two years are the treasurer, auditor, attorney-general, superintendent of public instruction, and commissioner of mines, manufactures and agriculture.

Articles of Confederation. While the Declaration of Independence was under consideration in the Continental Congress, and before it was finally agreed upon, measures were taken for the establishment of a constitutional form of government; and on the 11th of June, 1776, it was "Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and digest the form of a confederation to be entered into between these Colonies"; which committee was appointed the next day, June 12, and consisted of a member from each Colony, namely: Mr. Bartlett, Mr. S. Adams, Mr. Hopkins, Mr. Sherman, Mr. R. R. Livingston, Mr. Dickinson, Mr. McKean, Mr. Stone, Mr. Nelson, Mr. Hewes, Mr. E. Rutledge, and Mr. Gwinnett. On the 12th of July, 1776, the committee reported a draught of the Articles of Confederation, which was printed for the use of the members under the strictest injunctions of secrecy.

This report underwent a thorough discussion in Congress, from time to time, until the 15th of November, 1777; on which day, "Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union" were finally agreed to in form, and they were directed to be proposed to the legislatures of all the United States, and if approved by them, they were advised to authorize their delegates to ratify the same in the Congress of the United States; and in that event they were to become conclusive. On the 17th of November, 1777, the Congress agreed upon the form of a circular letter to accompany the Articles of Confederation, which concluded with a recommendation to each of the several legislatures "to invest its delegates with competent powers, ultimately, and in the name and behalf of the State, to subscribe articles of confederation and perpetual union of the United States, and to attend Congress for that purpose on or before the 10th day of March next." This letter was signed by the President of Congress and sent, with a copy of the articles, to each State legislature.

On the 26th of June, 1778, Congress agreed upon the form of a ratification of the Articles of Confederation, and directed a copy of the articles and the ratification to be engrossed on parchment; which, on the 9th of July, 1778, having been examined and the blanks filled, was signed by the delegates of New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and South Carolina. Congress then directed that a circular letter be addressed to the States whose delegates were not present, or being present, conceived they were not authorized to sign the ratification, informing them how many and what States had ratified the Articles of Confederation, and desiring them, with all convenient dispatch, to authorize their delegates to ratify the same. Of these States, North Carolina ratified on the 21st and Georgia on the 24th of July, 1778; New Jersey on the 26th of November following; Delaware on the 5th of May, 1779; Maryland on the 1st of March, 1781; and on the 2d of March, 1781, Congress assembled under the new form of government.

ACT OF CONFEDERATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

TO ALL TO WHOM THESE PRESENTS SHALL COME, WE THE UNDERSIGNED DELEGATES OF THE STATES AFFIXED TO OUR NAMES, SEND GREETING.

Whereas the Delegates of the United States of America in Congress assembled did on the 15th day of November in the Year of our Lord One Thousand Seven Hundred and Seventy seven, and in the Second Year of the Independence of America agree to certain articles of Confederation and perpetual Union between the states of Newhampshire, Massachusetts-bay, Rhodeisland and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia in the Words following, viz.

"ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION AND PERPETUAL UNION BETWEEN THE STATES OF NEWHAMPSHIRE, MASSACHUSETTS-BAY, RHODEISLAND AND PROVIDENCE PLANTATIONS, CONNECTICUT, NEW YORK, NEW JERSEY, PENNSYLVANIA, DELAWARE, MARYLAND, VIRGINIA, NORTH CAROLINA, SOUTH CAROLINA AND GEORGIA.

ARTICLE I. The Stile of this confederacy shall be "The United States of America."

ARTICLE II. Each State retains its Sovereignty, freedom and independence, and every Power, Jurisdiction and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled.

ARTICLE III. The said states hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other, for their common defence, the security of their Liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, binding themselves to assist each other, against all force offered to, or attacks, made upon them, or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretence whatever.

ARTICLE IV. The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different states in this union, the free inhabitants of each of these states, paupers, vagabonds and fugitives from Justice excepted, shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several states; and the people of each state shall have free ingress and regress to and from any other state, and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions and restrictions as the inhabitants thereof respectively, provided that such restrictions shall not extend so far as to prevent the removal of property imported into any state, to any other state of which the Owner is an inhabitant; provided also that no imposition, duties or restriction shall be laid by any state, on the property of the united states, or either of them.

If any Person guilty of, or charged with treason, felony, or other high misdemeanor in any state, shall flee from Justice, and be found in any of the united states, he shall upon demand of the Governor or executive power, of the state from which he fled, be delivered up and removed to the state having jurisdiction of his offence.

Full faith and credit shall be given in each of these states to the records, acts and judicial proceedings of the courts and magistrates of every other state.

ARTICLE V. For the more convenient management of the general interest of the united states, delegates shall be annually appointed in such manner as the legislature of each state shall direct, to meet in Congress on the first Monday in November, in every year, with a power reserved to each state, to recal its delegates, or any of them, at any time within the year, and to send others in their stead, for the remainder of the Year.

No state shall be represented in Congress by less than two, nor by more than seven Members; and no person shall be capable of being a delegate for more than three years in any term of six years; nor shall any person, being a delegate, be capable of holding any office under the united states, for which he, or another for his benefit receives any salary, fees or emolument of any kind.

Each state shall maintain its own delegates in a meeting of the states, and while they act as members of the committee of the states.

In determining questions in the united states, in Congress assembled, each state shall have one vote.

Freedom of speech and debate in Congress shall not be impeached or questioned in any Court, or place out of Congress, and the members of congress shall be protected in their persons from arrests and imprisonments, during the time of their going to and from, and attendance on congress, except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace.

ARTICLE VI. No state without the Consent of the united states in congress assembled, shall send any embassy to, or receive any embassy from, or enter into any conference, agreement, alliance or treaty with any King prince or state; nor shall any person holding any office of profit or trust under the united states, or any of them, accept of any present, emolument, office or title of any kind whatever from any king, prince or foreign state; nor shall the united states in congress assembled, or any of them, grant any title of nobility.

No two or more states shall enter into any treaty, confederation or alliance whatever between them, without the consent of the united states in congress assembled, specifying accurately the purposes for which the same is to be entered into, and how long it shall continue.

No state shall lay any imposts or duties, which may interfere with any stipulations in treaties, entered into by the united states in congress assembled with any king, prince or state, in pursuance of any treaties already proposed by congress to the courts of France and Spain.

No vessels of war shall be kept up in time of peace by any state, except such number only, as shall be deemed necessary by the united states in congress assembled, for the defence of such state, or its trade; nor shall any body of forces be kept up by any state, in time of peace, except such number only, as in the judgment of the united states, in congress assembled, shall be deemed requisite to garrison the forts necessary for the defence of such state; but every state shall always keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred, and shall provide and constantly have ready for use, in public stores, a due number of field-pieces and tents, and a proper quantity of arms, ammunition and camp equipage.

No state shall engage in any war without the consent of the united states in congress assembled, unless such state be actually invaded by enemies, or shall have received certain advice of a resolution being formed by some nation of Indians to invade such state, and the danger is so imminent as not to admit of a delay, till the united states in congress assembled can be consulted: nor shall any state grant commissions to any ships or vessels of war, nor letters of marque or reprisal, except it be after a declaration of war by the united states in congress assembled, and then only against the kingdom or state and the subjects thereof, against which war has been so declared, and under such regulations as shall be established by the united states in congress assembled, unless such state be infested by pirates, in which case vessels of war may be fitted out for that occasion, and kept so long as the danger shall continue, or until the united states in congress assembled shall determine otherwise.

ARTICLE VII. When land-forces are raised by any state for the common defence, all officers of or under the rank of colonel, shall be appointed by the legislature of each state respectively by whom such forces shall be raised, or in such manner as such state shall direct, and all vacancies shall be filled up by the state which first made the appointment.

ARTICLE VIII. All charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence or general welfare, and allowed by the united states in congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several states, in proportion to the value of all land within each state, granted to or surveyed for any Person, as such land and the buildings and improvements thereon shall be estimated according to such mode as the united states in congress assembled, shall from time to time direct and appoint.

The taxes for paying that proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the legislatures of the several states within the time agreed upon by the united states in congress assembled.

ARTICLE IX. The united states in congress assembled, shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war, except in the cases mentioned in the sixth article — of sending and receiving ambassadors — entering into treaties and alliances, provided that no treaty of commerce shall be made whereby the legislative power of the respective states shall be restrained from imposing such imposts and duties on foreigners, as their own people are subjected to, or from prohibiting the exportation or importation of any species of goods or commodities whatsoever — of establishing rules for deciding in all cases, what captures on land or water shall be legal, and in what manner prizes taken by land or naval forces in the service of the united states shall be divided or appropriated — of granting letters of marque and reprisal in times of peace — appointing courts for the trial of piracies and felonies committed on the high seas and establishing courts for receiving and determining finally appeals in all cases of captures, provided that no member of congress shall be appointed a judge of any of the said courts.

The united states in congress assembled shall also be the last resort on appeal in all disputes and differences now subsisting or that hereafter may arise between two or more states concerning boundary, jurisdiction or any other cause whatever; which authority shall always be exercised in the manner following: Whenever the legislative or executive authority or lawful agent of any state in controversy with another shall present a petition to congress stating the matter in question and praying for a hearing, notice thereof shall be given by order of congress to the legislative or executive authority of the other state in controversy, and a day assigned for the appearance of the parties by their lawful agents, who shall then be directed to appoint by joint consent, commissioners or judges to constitute a court for hearing and determining the matter in question: but if they cannot agree, congress shall name three persons out of each of the united states, and from the list of such persons each party shall alternately strike out one, the petitioners beginning, until the number shall be reduced to thirteen; and from that number not less than seven, nor more than nine names as congress shall direct, shall in the presence of congress be drawn out by lot, and the persons whose names shall be so drawn or any five of them, shall be commissioners or judges, to hear and finally determine the controversy, so always as a major part of the judges who shall hear the cause shall agree in the determination: and if either party shall neglect to attend at the day appointed, without showing reasons, which congress shall judge sufficient, or being present shall refuse to strike, the congress shall proceed to nominate three persons out of each State, and the secretary of congress shall strike in behalf of such party absent or refusing; and the judgment and sentence of the court to be appointed, in the manner before prescribed, shall be final and conclusive; and if any of the parties shall refuse to submit to the authority of such court, or to appear or defend their claim or cause, the court shall nevertheless proceed to pronounce sentence, or judgment, which shall in like manner be final and decisive, the judgment or sentence and other proceedings being in either case transmitted to congress, and lodged among the acts of congress for the security of the parties concerned: provided that every commissioner, before he sits in judgment, shall take an oath to be administered by one of the judges of the supreme or superior court of the state, where the cause shall be tried, "well and truly to hear and determine the matter in question, according to the best of his judgment, without favour, affection or hope of reward:" provided also that no state shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the united states.

All controversies concerning the private right of soil claimed under different grants of two or more states, whose jurisdictions as they may respect such lands, and the states which passed such grants are adjusted, the said grants or either of them being at the same time claimed to have originated antecedent to such settlement of jurisdiction, shall on the petition of either party to the congress of the united states, be finally determined as near as may be in the same manner as is before prescribed for deciding disputes respecting territorial jurisdiction between different states.

The united states in congress assembled shall also have the sole and exclusive right and power of regulating the alloy and value of coin struck by their own authority, or by that of the respective states — fixing the standard of weights and measures throughout the united states — regulating the trade and managing all affairs with the Indians, not members of any of the states, provided that the legislative right of any state within its own limits be not infringed or violated — establishing and regulating post-offices from one state to another, throughout all the united states, and exacting such postage on the papers passing thro' the same as may be requisite to defray the expences of the said office — appointing all officers of the land forces, in the service of the united states, excepting regimental officers — appointing all the officers of the naval forces, and commissioning all officers whatever in the service of the united states — making rules for the government and regulation of the said land and naval forces, and directing their operations.

The united states in congress assembled shall have authority to appoint a committee, to sit in the recess of congress, to be denominated "A Committee of the States," and to consist of one delegate from each state; and to appoint such other committees and civil officers as may be necessary for managing the general affairs of the united states under their direction — to appoint one of their number to preside, provided that no person be allowed to serve in the office of president more than one year in any term of three years; to ascertain the necessary sums of Money to be raised for the service of the united states, and to appropriate and apply the same for defraying the public expences — to borrow money, or emit bills on the credit of the united states, transmitting every half year to the respective states an account of the sums of money so borrowed or emitted, — to build and equip a navy — to agree upon the number of land forces, and to make requisitions from each state for its quota, in proportion to the number of white inhabitants in such state; which requisitions shall be binding, and thereupon the legislature of each state shall appoint the regimental officers, raise the men and cloath, arm and equip them in a soldier like manner, at the expence of the united states; and the officers and men so cloathed, armed and equipped shall march to the place appointed, and within the time agreed on by the united states in congress assembled: But if the united states in congress assembled shall, on consideration of circumstances judge proper that any state should not raise men, or should raise a smaller number than its quota, and that any other state should raise a greater number of men than the quota thereof, such extra number shall be raised, officered, cloathed, armed and equipped in the same manner as the quota of such state, unless the legislature of such state shall judge that such extra number cannot be safely spared out of the same, in which case they shall raise officer, cloath, arm and equip as many of such extra number as they judge can be safely spared. And the officers and men so cloathed, armed and equipped, shall march to the place appointed, and within the time agreed on by the united states in congress assembled.

The united states in congress assembled shall never engage in a war, nor grant letters of marque and reprisal in time of peace, nor enter into any treaties or alliances, nor coin money, nor regulate the value thereof, nor ascertain the sums and expences necessary for the defence and welfare of the united states, or any of them, nor emit bills, nor borrow money on the credit of the united states, nor appropriate money, nor agree upon the number of vessels of war, to be built or purchased, or the number of land or sea forces to be raised, nor appoint a commander-in-chief of the army or navy, unless nine states assent to the same: nor shall a question on any other point, except for adjourning from day to day be determined, unless by the votes of a majority of the united states in congress assembled.

The Congress of the united states shall have power to adjourn to any time within the year, and to any place within the united states, so that no period of adjournment be for a longer duration than the space of six Months, and shall publish the Journal of their proceedings monthly, except such parts thereof relating to treaties, alliances or military operations, as in their judgment require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the delegates of each state on any question shall be entered on the Journal, when it is desired by any delegate; and the delegates of a state, or any of them, at his or their request shall be furnished with a transcript of the said Journal, except such parts as are above excepted, to lay before the legislatures of the several states.

ARTICLE X. The committee of the states, or any nine of them, shall be authorized to execute, in the recess of congress, such of the powers of congress as the united states in congress assembled, by the consent of nine states, shall from time to time think expedient to vest them with; provided that no power be delegated to the said committee, for the exercise of which, by the articles of confederation, the voice of nine states in the congress of the united states assembled is requisite.

ARTICLE XI. Canada acceding to this confederation, and joining in the measures of the united states, shall be admitted into, and entitled to all the advantages of this union: but no other colony shall be admitted into the same, unless such admission be agreed to by nine states.

ARTICLE XII. All bills of credit emitted, monies borrowed and debts contracted by, or under the authority of congress, before the assembling of the united states, in pursuance of the present confederation, shall be deemed and considered as a charge against the united states, for payment and satisfaction whereof the said united states, and the public faith are hereby solemnly pledged.

ARTICLE XIII. Every state shall abide by the determinations of the united states in congress assembled, on all questions which by this confederation are submitted to them. And the Articles of this confederation shall be inviolably observed by every state, and the union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them; unless such alteration be agreed to in a congress of the united states, and be afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every state.

AND WHEREAS it hath pleased the Great Governor of the World to incline the hearts of the legislatures we respectively represent in congress, to approve of, and to authorize us to ratify the said articles of confederation and perpetual union. KNOW YE that we the undersigned delegates, by virtue of the power and authority to us given for that purpose, do by these presents, in the name and in behalf of our respective constituents, fully and entirely ratify and confirm each and every of the said articles of confederation and perpetual union, and all and singular the matters and things therein contained: And we do further solemnly plight and engage the faith of our respective constituents, that they shall abide by the determinations of the united states in congress assembled, on all questions, which by the said confederation are submitted to them. And that the articles thereof shall be inviolably observed by the states we respectively represent, and that the union shall be perpetual.

IN WITNESS whereof we have hereunto set our hands in Congress. DONE at Philadelphia in the state of Pennsylvania the ninth Day of July in the Year of our Lord one Thousand seven Hundred and Seventy-eight, and in the third year of the independence of America.

Austria-Hungary is a monarchy composed of a Cisleithan portion, officially known as Austria, and a Transleithan portion known as Hungary. The reigning dynasty is the Habsburg-Lorraine dynasty, and the law of succession is that the Crown passes by right of primogeniture and lineal succession to males, or, in default of males, to females. Each country has according to the compromise made in 1867, its own constitution, a limited monarchy, and each possesses a separate parliament, but they have united under a common sovereign in the establishment of a common army and navy, and in the conduct of foreign affairs. The control in regard to common affairs and the voting of money for common purposes are entrusted to a supreme body known as the delegations. Of these there are two, each composed of sixty members, representing the legislative bodies of Austria and Hungary, the upper houses returning twenty and the lower houses forty delegates. The members of the delegations are appointed for one year, and are summoned annually by the emperor alternately at Vienna and at Budapest. Subject to the delegations are the three executive departments for foreign affairs, war, and common finance, and the common court of public accounts. The compromise is expressly subject to periodical revision, only so far as it affects the regulation of the fiscal and commercial affairs of the two countries, the quota paid by them to the common expenses of the empire, and the privileges of the Austro-Hungarian Bank. After prolonged negotiations a new customs and commercial treaty was signed, October 8, 1907, which recognized the equality and freedom of action of each contracting party, and a separate (but identical) customs tariff for each country.

Belgium is a kingdom under Leopold II., of Saxe-Coburg, and by the constitution of 1831, following on the secession from the Netherlands in 1830, declared to be a constitutional representative, and hereditary monarchy. Belgium is a neutral power, her neutrality being guaranteed under the Treaty of London, 1831, by Great Britain, Austria, Prussia, and Russia. The executive power is vested in the king and his ministers, the legislative power jointly in king, senate, and chamber of deputies. All citizens over 25, who have lived at least a year in the same commune, have a vote. An additional vote is accorded them if they are (1) either 35 years of age, married, with legitimate offspring, and pay a tax of at least five francs to the state; or (2) are 25 years old and own immovable property to the value of at least 2,000 francs, or have a corresponding income from such property, or for two years have received at least 100 francs a year from Belgium funds. Two additional votes are given to citizens of 25 years of age who possess a diploma of higher education or have filled a public or private position implying the possession of such education. No citizen can have more than three votes. From this electorate both houses of the legislature are chosen, save for those senators who are elected indirectly. The senate of 110 members is elected for eight years. The number of members elected directly, eighty-three, is equal to half the number of deputies. The indirectly elected senators are chosen by the provincial councils, two for each province with less than 500,000 inhabitants; three for each with more than 500,000 and less 1,000,000; and four for each with over 1,000,000. The deputies are elected for four years, in the proportion of one to every 40,000 inhabitants, and number 166. One-half retire every two years. Senators must be 40, and deputies 25 years of age. Each deputy receives 4,000 francs yearly, and travels free.

Bolivia. The constitution of the Republic of Bolivia bears date October 28, 1880. By its provisions the executive power is vested in a president, elected for a term of four years by direct popular vote, and not eligible for reëlection at the termination of his period of office; while the legislative authority rests with a congress of two chambers, called the senate, and the chamber of deputies. The suffrage is possessed by all who can read and write. There are sixteen senators (two for each department) elected for six years, and sixty-nine deputies elected for four years. Both senators and deputies are elected by direct vote of the people. Of the senators one-third retire every two years; of the deputies one-half retire every two years. Senators and deputies receive a salary of 500 bolivianos (40 litre) per month during the sittings, which, as a rule, last for sixty days, but may be extended to ninety days. Extraordinary sessions may be held for special purposes. There are a president, two vice-presidents and a ministry, divided into six departments — of foreign relations and worship; finance and industry; government and fomento; justice and education; war; colonization and agriculture.

Brazil. A republic on the east coast of Central South America, which, until 1889, was an empire under Emperor Pedro II., of the house of Braganza. A revolution then, however, broke out, and a new constitution was adopted in February 1891. The chief feature of this was the establishment of the old provinces as twenty-one separate states, self-governed except for federal purposes, but with all fiscal matters, the maintenance of order, the defense of the country, the currency, reserved to the federal government. The executive authority is in the hands of the president, elected for four years only by the people directly. Legislative authority is exercised by the national congress, composed of a senate of sixty-three members, directly elected by the states for nine years, one-third retiring every three years, and a chamber of deputies of 212 members. Deputies and senators are paid.

The former must have been citizens for four and the latter for six years. Deputies are elected directly, with provision for minority representation, for three years, one member being chosen for every 70,000 of the population.

British Empire. The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the nucleus around which the British Empire has been built, was perfected in 1603, when the crowns of England and Scotland were united. The executive power of the empire vests in the sovereign, through his ministers. The real power of the empire, however, is to be found in Parliament, a body which not only has complete legislative power, but which exercises, through the Lower House, much authority in executive matters. Parliament consists of an Upper House of Lords and a Lower House of Commons. It lasts seven years or until dissolved by the sovereign, and it usually meets annually for a term of about six months. The members of the House of Lords are peers, who hold either by hereditary right or by crown appointment to the peerage. In 1908 there were 616 peers. The House of Commons consists of members elected from counties, boroughs, and universities—670 in all in 1908.

The Colonies proper form three classes:—(1) The Crown Colonies, which are entirely controlled by the home government; (2) those possessing Representative Institutions, in which the Crown has no more than a veto on legislation, but the home government retains the control of public officers; and (3) those possessing Responsible Government, in which the home government has no control over any public officer, though the Crown appoints the governor and still retains a veto on legislation.

The established Church of England is the Protestant Episcopal Church, of which the king is the supreme head; but all religions are tolerated and are equal at law. Public instruction is not compulsory, but the national board of education maintains control of the school boards and requires that accommodations be provided for all children between the ages of five and fourteen years. Secondary education is not controlled by the government, but the university system is, perhaps, more perfectly developed in England than in any other country. England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales each has its graded systems of courts of justice.

The Parliament.—The present form of Parliament, divided into two houses, the Lords and the Commons, dates from the middle of the Fourteenth Century. The members of the House of Commons are elected by popular vote, about one-sixth of the population being electors, and the election must be by secret vote by ballot. The House of Lords is composed of peers, who hold their seats by hereditary right, by creation of the sovereign, by virtue of office (the bishops), by election for life (the Irish peers), and by election for the term of Parliament (the Scottish peers).

No one under 21 years of age can be a member of Parliament. All clergymen of the Church of England, ministers of the Church of Scotland, and Roman Catholic clergymen, and all government contractors and sheriffs or returning officers are disqualified. No English or Scottish peer can be elected to the House of Commons; but non-representative Irish peers are eligible for membership.

The present Cabinet consists of the following offices:

1. Prime Minister and (usually) First Lord of the Treasury.
2. Lord High Chancellor.
3. Lord Privy Seal.
4. Lord President of the Council and President of the Board of Education.
5. Chancellor of the Exchequer.
6. Secretary of State for Home Affairs.
7. Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.
8. Secretary of State for The Colonies.
9. Secretary of State for India.
10. Secretary of State for War.
11. First Lord of the Admiralty.
12. Lord Chancellor of Ireland.
13. President of Local Government Board.
14. President of Board of Trade.
15. Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.
16. Secretary for Scotland.
17. President of Board of Agriculture and Fisheries.
18. Postmaster General.
19. Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

The right of Edward VII. to the throne of England rests upon the statute by which the succession to the Crown of Great Britain and Ireland was vested upon Princess Sophia of Hanover and "the heirs of her body, being Protestants."

The present ruler is "Edward VII., by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions Beyond the Seas, King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India," as his title was declared under the Royal Title Act, proclaimed November 4, 1901.

The Heir Apparent.—The heir apparent to the throne is the eldest son of the King, George Frederick, Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall and York, and Duke of Rothesay, in Scotland.

Bulgaria. By the treaty of Berlin, 1878, Bulgaria was constituted an autonomous and tributary principality under the suzerainty of the Porte. In 1885, Eastern Roumelia was united to Bulgaria. The executive power is vested in the prince, assisted by a council of ministers, and the legislative power in a single chamber, the Sobranje, or national assembly, elected for five years by manhood suffrage in the proportion of one member to every 20,000 of the population. There is also a Great Sobranje, consisting of delegates selected in the proportion of one to 10,000 of the population, to which constitutional and other questions, such as a vacancy on the throne or the acquisition of territory, must be referred.

California. A Constitution was framed by a convention of delegates assembled in the pueblo of Monterey in the year 1849, but it did not become effective until the Congress of the United States passed the act of admission, September 9, 1850. In 1862 the Constitution received important amendments, and in 1879

a new Constitution was adopted. Since that year numerous amendments have been made, but all of minor importance. To amend the California Constitution it is necessary only to secure a two-thirds majority in each branch of the Legislature, and a simple majority vote for the amendments at the next popular election. The State Legislature is composed of the Senate, a body of forty members, elected for terms of four years—half the number being elected each two years—and the Assembly, eighty members, elected for two years. The qualifications for eligibility to the Senate or Assembly are citizenship of the State for three years and residence in the district for one year. Neither house of the Legislature possesses any advantage over the other in originating legislation. Certain of the governor's appointments must be submitted to the Senate for approval. In impeachment cases the Assembly brings the impeachment, and it is tried by the Senate. The present Constitution contains numerous specific prohibitions of local and special laws, besides forbidding them in all cases where a general law can be made applicable. In 1870 there was adopted a complete set of codes—political, civil, civil procedure, and penal—and these have been subject to amendment at each session of the Legislature. At the session of 1905 the penal code and code of civil procedure were revised. The term of office of the governor is four years. He possesses supreme executive authority, issues all commissions, is commander-in-chief of the army and navy, and is charged with responsibility to see that all laws are faithfully executed. All State boards and commissions, with two or three exceptions, are filled by his appointment, the concurrence of the Senate being required in certain instances, and in others not. He is empowered to grant pardons, but where a person has been more than once convicted there is required the assent of a majority of the justices of the Supreme Court. The governor is vested with authority to call the Legislature together in extraordinary session. During sessions of the Legislature the governor may veto any bill which has passed, and it does not become law unless it again passes, and by a two-thirds vote in each house. Besides the governor and secretary of state the other officials are the lieutenant-governor, who is presiding officer of the Senate, the State controller, the attorney-general, the State treasurer, the State surveyor-general, who is also registrar of the land office, the superintendent of public instruction, and the State printer. The most important State boards and commissions are: The board of education; the board of regents of the university, appointed by the governor for terms of sixteen years; the State board of prison directors, appointed by the governor for terms of ten years, and having entire control of the penitentiaries; the State board of equalization, elected at general elections, and dealing with the assessment of property for revenue purposes; the railroad commission, elected and vested with authority to regulate railroad charges; the bank commission, the State board of health, the insurance commission, and the commission of public works, the State board of charities and corrections, board of agriculture, and the commission in lunacy. The last-named, which is an ex-officio commission made up of State officers, controls the hospitals for the insane. California is divided into fifty-seven counties, one of which—San Francisco—has a combined county and city government; the other fifty-six have county governments distinct from the government of the cities and towns which they contain. County governments are created by the Legislature by general act. In each county government the legislative authority is vested in a board of supervisors of five members elected from districts. The other county officers, with few exceptions, are also elective.

City charters are framed by boards of freeholders elected for that purpose; are submitted to the voters of the cities for which they are framed, and must afterwards be ratified by the Legislature. Towns are incorporated by vote of their inhabitants under a general municipal corporations act, providing for six different classes of corporations, according to population.

Canada. The Dominion of Canada originally consisted of the two provinces of Canada—Upper and Lower—Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, but the "British North American Act," which was passed in 1867, not only provided for the consolidation of these provinces, but made provision for the admission of British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, the Northwest Territories and Newfoundland, a privilege of which Newfoundland alone has not availed herself. In accordance with this act of consolidation the Constitution of the Dominion is "similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom," and, while the executive authority is vested in the British Sovereign, the legislative power of the Dominion is exercised by a Parliament of two Houses—the Senate and the House of Commons. Each province forming the Dominion has a separate Parliament and administration, a lieutenant-governor being at the head of all provincial bodies. The Senate of the Dominion is composed of eighty-one members, who have been nominated for life. Each must be at least 30 years of age, a born or naturalized subject and possessed of $4,000 worth of property in the province from which he was appointed. The 213 members of the House are elected by the vote of their constituencies, the electors of which are qualified by the act of each provincial assembly. The Speaker of the Senate and House each receives a salary of $4,000, while each member of the two houses is granted a session allowance of $1,500, with ten cents per mile for traveling expenses. In cases of absence, except for sickness, the sum of $8 per diem is deducted. The Governor-General, who receives a salary of $50,000 per annum, is appointed by the Federal Government for a term of five years, and he is assisted in his functions by a council composed of fourteen heads of departments, each of whom receives a salary of $7,000 per annum, except the Premier, who has a salary of $8,000 per annum. The heads of departments are as follows:

1. Premier and President of the Council.

2. Secretary of State.
3. Minister of Trade and Commerce.
4. Minister of Justice and Attorney-General.
5. Minister of Marine and Fisheries.
6. Minister of Railways and Canals.
7. Minister of Militia and Defence.
8. Minister of Finance.
9. Postmaster-General and Minister of Labor.
10. Minister of Agriculture.
11. Minister of Public Works.
12. Minister of Interior.
13. Minister of Customs.
14. Minister of Inland Revenue.

The representation from the several provinces is as follows: Ontario, twenty-four Senators, ninety-two Commons; Quebec, twenty-four Senators, sixty-five Commons; Nova Scotia, ten Senators, twenty Commons; New Brunswick, ten Senators, fourteen Commons; Manitoba, four Senators, seven Commons; British Columbia, three Senators, six Commons; Prince Edward Island, four Senators, five Commons; Northwest Territories, two Senators, four Commons.

Provincial Government. By the provisions of the Consolidation Act each province has full power to regulate its own local affairs and dispose of its own revenue, provided it does not interfere with the policy of the central government. The lieutenant-governor of each province is appointed by the Governor-General, while the other officials are elected by the people. There is a very perfect system of municipal government throughout the Dominion, the counties and townships having local governments or councils which regulate their local taxation. The administration of justice is based on the English model, except in Quebec Province, where the old French law prevails. The only court that has jurisdiction throughout the Dominion (except the Exchequer and the Maritime Court) is the Supreme Court, the ultimate court of appeal in civil and criminal cases. In certain cases an appeal may be had to her Majesty's Privy Council.

Chile. Chile is a Republic, with laws administered under a Constitution formed in 1833 and subsequently amended. The President is elected for a term of five years by indirect vote, much as the like officer is chosen in the United States. He is assisted by a Cabinet as follows:

Secretary of Premier and Secretary of the Interior.

Secretary of Foreign Affairs.

Secretary of Justice and Public Instruction.

Secretary of Finance.

Secretary of War and Marine

Secretary of Industry and Public Works.

He is not eligible for reelection for a succeeding term. The day of election is June 25th of the last year of the President's term of office, and the inaugural date is September 18th of the same year. Congress consists of two Houses — a Senate and a Chamber of Deputies. Members of the Senate are elected by popular vote for a term of six years, and Deputies are chosen in the same way for a term of three years. The proportion is one Senator for three Deputies. Electors must be 21 years of age and able to read and write. The republic is divided into provinces, which are subdivided into departments. Local government is exercised in the former by Intendents and in the latter by Gobernadores. The police of Santiago and the capitals of the provinces are organized and regulated by the President of the Republic.

China. The tenth Emperor of China, the present sovereign of the Manchu dynasty of Tsing, which destroyed the native dynasty of Ming in 1644, reigns under the style of Hsuantung. In this country there is no law relative to hereditary succession to the throne, the right being given each sovereign to appoint as his successor a member of the family of a younger generation. In the case of the late Emperor Tung-Chi, who died in his 80th year, no successor was named, but, as a result of arrangements conducted by the Empress Dowager Tszu-Hszi (born November 17, 1834), widow of the Emperor Hien-Feng, predecessor and father of Tung-Chi, in conjunction with Prince Chun, the infant son of the latter was designated as the nominal occupant of the throne. The young Emperor, having become of age, assumed the government in March, 1887. Two years later, in February, he assumed full control. An imperial edict stating that the Emperor had resigned power to the Empress Dowager was issued September 22, 1898, and as a result the direction of affairs remained in her hands until her death, November 15, 1908. Pu-yi, an infant (whose official name is Hsuantung), was, on the death of Kuang-su, November 8, 1908, decreed the royal successor of the latter.

The Ministry.— Civil Administration (Lipou), Soun Chia-Nai; Finance (Houpou), Young Lou; Religion and Ceremonies (Lipou), Shihhsu; War (Pingpou), Koun-Kang; Justice (Hsingpou), Kouei-heng; Foreign Office (Li-fan-yuan), Ching-hsin and A-Ko-tan; Censors (Tou-tcha-youen), Pouliang and Lu-jun-hsiang; Imperial Academy (Han-lin-youan), K'oun-kang; Railroads and Mines, Wang-wen-shao; Counselors of the Empire (Cheng-wou-chou), Ch'ing, Young-lou, K'oun-Kang, Wang-wen-shao, Lou-ch'ouan-lin, Ch'u-houng-chi, Chan-chih-fung, Liou-k'oun-yi.

The Nation.— The laws of the empire are laid down in the Ta-ts'ing-hwei-tien, or "Collected Regulations" of the "Ts'ing dynasty," and are founded on the idea that the government of the state be based upon the government of its family. To the Chun Chi Chu, or the Privy Council, or Grand Council, is intrusted the supreme direction of the empire. The supreme direction of the administration is in the hands of the Nei-Ko, or Cabinet, which is composed of four members, two of Manchu and two of Chinese origin. In addition to the above are two assistants from the Han-Lin, or Great College, whose duties are to see that nothing contrary to both the civil and religious laws of the empire contained in the Ta-ts'ing-hwei-tien and sacred books of Confucius is done. The members of this Cabinet are denominated Ta-hsio-shih, or Ministers of State; and under their orders are the Chu-pu, or seven boards of government. Each of these boards is presided over by a Manchu and a Chinese. These boards are as follows: (1) The Board of Civil Appointments, looking to the conduct and administration of all civil affairs; (2) The Board of Revenues, in charge of all financial affairs;

(3) The Board of Rites and Ceremonies, whose duty is to enforce the laws and customs to be observed by the people; (4) The Military Board; (5) The Board of Public Works; (6) The High Tribunal of Criminal Jurisdiction, and (7) The Admiralty Board at Tientsin, established in 1885. A body that is independent of the Government and theoretically is above the central administration is the Tu-ch'a-yuen, or Board of Public Censors. The membership numbers between forty and fifty, who are under two presidents, one of Manchu and the other of Chinese birth. By an ancient custom of the empire all the members of the board are permitted to present any remonstrance to the sovereign. It is necessary that one censor be present at the meetings of each of the Government Boards. On January 19, 1861, the Tsungli Yamen, or Foreign Office, was created by a decree, and in July, 1902, it was superseded by the formation of a new Foreign Office designated as the Wai-wu-pu. Prince Ching was appointed president, and this office, with its four secretaries, took precedence over all other boards. On the conclusion of the war between Russia and Japan in 1905, a treaty and additional agreement relating to Manchuria were entered into between Japan and China. By the former the Chinese Government consented to all the transfers and assignments made by Russia to Japan in Manchuria; and the latter provides, inter alia, for the speedy opening by China of the following cities and towns in Manchuria as places of international residence and trade:—Feng-huang-ch'eng, Liao-yang, Hsinmintun, Tung-chiang-tzu (on the Liao River), and Fa-kumen in Fengtien Province; Ch'ang-ch'un, Kirin, Harbin, Ninguta, Hunch'un, and Sansing in the Kirin Province; and Tsitsihar, Hailar, Aihun, and Manchuli in the Heilungchiang Province.

Colombia. The Republic of Colombia gained its independence of Spain in 1819, and was officially constituted December 27, 1819. It split up into Venezuela, Ecuador, and the Republic of New Granada, February 29, 1832. The Constitution of April 1, 1858, changed the Republic into a confederation of eight States, under the name of Confederation Granadina. On September 20, 1861, the convention of Bogotá brought out the confederation under the new name of United States of New Granada, with nine States. On May 8, 1863, an improved Constitution was formed, and the States reverted to the old name Colombia—United States of Colombia. The revolution of 1885 brought about another change, and the national council of Bogotá, composed of three delegates from each State, promulgated the Constitution of August 4, 1886. The sovereignty of the States was abolished, and they became simple departments, with governors appointed by the President of the Republic, though they have retained some of their old rights, such as the management of their own finances. The legislative power rests with a Congress of two Houses, called the Senate and the House of Representatives. The Senate contains forty-eight Senators of whom three are chosen for the Federal District by the President and two Cabinet Ministers, and three for each department by the governor, his secretaries and the president or judge of the Court of Accounts of each department. The House of Representatives consists of sixty-seven members elected by the people in twenty-four electoral circumscriptions (one for every 50,000 of population), but in each of the four intendencies appointed by the Intendente, his secretary and three inhabitants are chosen by the municipal council of the capital of the intendency. Senators and Representatives are elected for four years. The President is chosen by Congress in public session and by an absolute majority of votes. His term of office is four years, but the present President is appointed exceptionally for ten years from January 1, 1905. Congress elects for a term of two years, a substitute, who, should the President and Vice-President during a Presidential term vacate the office of President, fills the vacancy. The Ministries are those of the Interior, Foreign Affairs, Finance and the Treasury, War, Public Instruction, and Public Works.

Colorado. The original Constitution of 1876 is still in force in Colorado, though up to 1904 it has been ten times amended. The Legislature, known as the General Assembly, consists of a Senate of thirty-five members elected for four years, one-half retiring every two years, and of a House of Representatives of sixty-five members elected for two years. Sessions are biennial and are limited to ninety days. All bills for raising revenue must originate in the House of Representatives. It is the right of the House of Representatives to impeach; of the Senators, to try and determine impeachments. Amendments to the Constitution may be proposed in either House, but to become part of the Constitution they must have received the sanction of a two-thirds vote of all the members of each House and of a majority ratification by popular vote. Eligible to either House are all citizens of the United States twenty-five years of age, and twelve months resident in the district for which they seek election. The executive power is vested in a governor elected for two years. He is commander-in-chief of the State militia. It rests with him to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint officers not otherwise provided for by law or the Constitution. He may summon special sessions of the Legislature, and has a limited power to grant reprieves, commutations, and pardons. In legislation he has the power of veto, which may be overridden by a two-thirds vote of each House. The State officials are the governor, secretary of state, a lieutenant-governor, an auditor, a treasurer, an attorney-general, and a superintendent of public instruction, all of whom, with the governor, are elected on a two-year tenure.

Connecticut. The present Constitution of Connecticut was adopted in 1818 and there have been thirty-one amendments to it at different times. The Legislative power is vested in the General Assembly, consisting of a Senate and a House of Representatives. The Senate at present consists of thirty-five members, one from each of the senatorial districts into which the State is divided. The House of Representatives consists of 255 members, who must be electors of the towns for which they are elected, each town of over 5,000 inhabitants being entitled to send two representatives. Members of each House are elected for the term of two years. The supreme executive power is vested in a governor elected for two years by the legal voters. He must be an elector of the State and be over 30 years of age. His duties include the command of the military forces, the adjournment of the Legislature when necessary, the recommendation of legislation, the granting of reprieves until the end of the next session of the General Assembly, and the supervision of the execution of the laws. Every bill passed by both Houses requires the assent of the governor, who may within three days remit it for reconsideration to the House in which it originated; if then the bill be approved by a majority in each House it becomes law. Amendments to the Constitution agreed to by a majority in each House, approved by a two-thirds majority in each House of the Legislature next elected, and approved by the people at special meetings held for the purpose in each town, become part of the Constitution. The State officials are: the governor, secretary of state, treasurer, and the comptroller of public accounts. For local administration the State is divided into eight counties, which are subdivided into cities, boroughs, and townships.

Constitution of the United States of America. In May, 1785, a committee of Congress made a report recommending an alteration in the Article of Confederation, but no action was taken on it, and it was left to the State Legislatures to proceed in the matter. In January, 1786, the Legislature of Virginia passed a resolution providing for the appointment of five commissioners, who, or any three of them, should meet such commissioners as might be appointed in the other States of the Union, at a time and place to be agreed upon, to take into consideration the trade of the United States; to consider how far a uniform system in their commercial regulations may be necessary to their common interest and their permanent harmony; and to report to the several States such an act, relative to this great object, as, when ratified by them, will enable the United States in Congress effectually to provide for the same. The Virginia commissioners, after some correspondence, fixed the first Monday in September as the time, and the city of Annapolis as the place for the meeting, but only four other States were represented, viz: Delaware, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania; the commissioners appointed by Massachusetts, New Hampshire, North Carolina, and Rhode Island failed to attend. Under the circumstances of so partial a representation, the commissioners present agreed upon a report (drawn by Mr. Hamilton, of New York), expressing their unanimous conviction that it might essentially tend to advance the interests of the Union if the States by which they were respectively delegated would concur, and use their endeavors to procure the concurrence of the other States, in the appointment of commissioners to meet at Philadelphia on the second Monday of May following, to take into consideration the situation of the United States; to devise such further provisions as should appear to them necessary to render the Constitution of the Federal Government adequate to the exigencies of the Union; and to report such an act for that purpose to the United States in Congress assembled as, when agreed to by them and afterwards confirmed by the Legislatures of every State, would effectually provide for the same. Congress, on the 21st of February, 1787, adopted a resolution in favor of a convention, and the Legislatures of those States which had not already done so (with the exception of Rhode Island), promptly appointed delegates. On the 25th of May, seven States having convened, George Washington, of Virginia, was unanimously elected President, and the consideration of the proposed constitution was commenced. On the 17th of September, 1787, the Constitution as engrossed and agreed upon was signed by all the members present, except Mr. Gerry, of Massachusetts, and Messrs. Mason and Randolph, of Virginia. The president of the convention transmitted it to Congress, with a resolution, stating how the proposed Federal Government should be put in operation, and an explanatory letter. Congress, on the 28th of September, 1787, directed the Constitution so framed, with the resolutions and letter concerning the same, to "be transmitted to the several Legislatures in order to be submitted to a convention of delegates chosen in each State by the people thereof, in conformity to the resolves of the convention." On the 4th of March, 1789, the day which had been fixed for commencing the operations of Government under the new Constitution, it had been ratified by the conventions chosen in each State to consider it, as follows: Delaware, December 7, 1787; Pennsylvania, December 12, 1787; New Jersey, December 18, 1787; Georgia, January 2, 1788; Connecticut, January 9, 1788; Massachusetts, February 6, 1788; Maryland, April 28, 1788; South Carolina, May 23, 1788; New Hampshire, June 21, 1788; Virginia, June 26, 1788; and New York, July 26, 1788. The President informed Congress, on the 28th of January, 1790, that North Carolina had ratified the Constitution November 21, 1789; and he informed Congress on the 1st of June, 1790, that Rhode Island had ratified the Constitution May 29, 1789. Vermont, in convention, ratified the Constitution January 10, 1791, and was, by an act of Congress approved February 18, 1791, "received and admitted into this Union as a new and entire member of the United States."

CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES

PREAMBLE.—We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this CONSTITUTION for the United States of America.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION I. All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

SECTION II. 1. The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

2. No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

3. Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct. The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have at least one Representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to choose 3; Massachusetts, 8; Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, 1; Connecticut, 5; New York, 6; New Jersey, 4; Pennsylvania, 8; Delaware, 1; Maryland, 6; Virginia, 10; North Carolina, 5; South Carolina, 5; and Georgia, 3.*

4. When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the Executive Authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

5. The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment.

SECTION III. 1. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

2. Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary appointment until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

3. No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

4. The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided.

5. The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

6. The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

7. Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to law.

SECTION IV. 1. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to places of choosing Senators.

2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

SECTION V. 1. Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide.

2. Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two-thirds expel a member.

3. Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal.

4. Neither House, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

SECTION VI. 1. The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. They shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either House they shall not be questioned in any other place.

2. No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

SECTION VII. 1. All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills.

2. Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it, but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered; and if approved by two-thirds of that House it shall become a law. But in all such cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the journal of each House respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their adjournment prevent its return; in which case it shall not be a law.

3. Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and the House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

SECTION VIII. 1. The Congress shall have power:

To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

2. To borrow money on the credit of the United States.

3. To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

4. To establish an uniform rule of naturalization and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

5. To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures.

6. To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States.

7. To establish post-offices and post-roads.

8. To promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive rights to their respective writings and discoveries.

9. To constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court.

10. To define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations.

11. To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water.

12. To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.

13. To provide and maintain a navy.

* See Article XIV., Amendments.

14. To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

15. To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

16. To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

17. To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dry-docks and other needful buildings.

18. To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

SECTION IX. 1. The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person.

2. The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it.

3. No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed.

4. No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration herebefore directed to be taken.

5. No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

6. No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another, nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

7. No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time.

8. No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States. And no person holding any office of profit nor trust under them shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever from any king, prince, or foreign state.

SECTION X. 1. No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation, grant letters of marque and reprisal, coin money, emit bills of credit, make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts, pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or grant any title of nobility.

2. No State shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any impost or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws, and the net produce of all duties and imposts, laid by any State on imports or exports, shall be for the use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress.

3. No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay.

ARTICLE II.

SECTION I. 1. The Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice-President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows:

2. Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector.

3. [The Electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for two persons, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And they shall make a list of all the persons voted for, and of the number of votes for each, which list they shall sign and certify and transmit, sealed, to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, and if there be more than one who have such majority, and have an equal number of votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately choose by ballot one of them for President; and if no person have a majority, then from the five highest on the list the said House shall in like manner choose the President. But in choosing the President, the vote shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote. A quorum, for this purpose, shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. In every case, after the choice of the President, the person having the greatest number of votes of the electors shall be the Vice-President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal votes, the Senate shall choose from them by ballot the Vice-President.] *

4. The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors and the day on which they shall give their votes, which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

5. No person except a natural born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President; neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained to the age of thirty-five years and been fourteen years a resident within the United States.

6. In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President, and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected.

7. The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them.

8. Before he enter on the execution of his office, he shall take the following oath or affirmation:

"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

SECTION II. 1. The President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States; he may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the executive departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices, and he shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offences against the United States except in cases of impeachment.

2. He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

3. The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session.

SECTION III. He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper; he shall receive ambassadors and other public ministers; he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the United States.

SECTION IV. The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

ARTICLE III.

SECTION I. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

SECTION II. 1. The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States, between a State and citizens of another State, between citizens of different States, between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects.

2. In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before-mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

3. The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury, and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed.

SECTION III. 1. Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.

2. The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained.

ARTICLE IV.

SECTION I. Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof.

SECTION II. 1. The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

2. A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the Executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

3. No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.

SECTION III. 1. New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress.

2. The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

SECTION IV. The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and, on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened), against domestic violence.

ARTICLE V.

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress; provided that no amendment which may be made prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the Ninth Section of the First Article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

ARTICLE VI.

1. All debts contracted and engagements entered into before the adoption of this Constitution shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution as under the Confederation.

2. This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

3. The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution; but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.

ARTICLE VII.

The ratification of the Conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION

ARTICLE I.

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

ARTICLE II.

A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

ARTICLE III.

No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

ARTICLE IV.

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

ARTICLE V.

No person shall be held to answer for a capital or other infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service, in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

ARTICLE VI.

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.

ARTICLE VII.

In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.

ARTICLE VIII.

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

ARTICLE IX.

The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

ARTICLE X.

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

ARTICLE XI.

The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States, by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State.

ARTICLE XII.

The electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President; and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which list they shall sign and certify, and transmit, sealed, to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate; the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President, whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

ARTICLE XIII.

1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

ARTICLE XIV.

1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.
